Annadamangal does not tell an original story. Its material is far too familiar and taken not only from Bharatchandra's predecessors in Bengali poetry, but also from the epics, the puranas and the Sanskrit classics, and narrated with great originality. It is Bharatchandra's presentation of details, his juxtaposing the different elements and his shaping the various aspects into a neat whole that turn him into not only a significant, but also a great poet. As a poet Bharatchandra moves between a variety of emotions in the narrative, and his realistic and highly emotional descriptive passages leave a deep impression upon his readers.

Bharatchandra was born at a time when the powerful foundation of the Mughal empire with its order and systematisation had begun crumbling, and an alien race had not only arrived in Bengal but also started taking over the administration. Society had already begun to disintegrate and anarchy had been loosed upon the world. Annadamangal reflects this historical time and also provides many significant and contemporary particulars which suggest that the narrative in the poem is a necessary product of the demands the poet's time had made upon the individual's life because of the altered historical circumstances.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brajendranath Bandyopadhyay and Sajanikanta Das (ed.), Bharatchandra granthavali (Calcutta, 1943); Shivaprasad Bhattacharya, Bharatchandra o Ramprasad (Calcutta).

He.D.

Sh.Ba.

RAY, BIPINBIHARI (Oriya; b.1887, d.1975) belonged to Asureswar in the district of Cuttack. He studied philosophy for his M.A. at Calcutta University and stood first in the examination. He joined Bihar and Orissa Education Service and taught most of the time at Ravenshaw College, Cuttack, from where he retired as Professor of Philosophy. He donated large sums of money to charitable institutions, especially for the cause of education. He was the author of a large number of essays in Oriya which deal with sociological and philosophical topics. These have been published under the title of Prabandha sopana. He is also the author of Tarkabignana and Samajika prabandha. In short and measured sentences he conveys profound ideas and is sometimes called the Bacon of Oriya literature. The collection of his essays is a store-house of wisdom and is as such unique in Oriya literature.

K.T.

RAY, DASARATHI (Bengali; b.1806, d.1857), popularly known as Dasu Ray, had no formal education, knew English very little, and began his career as a Kaviwal in the party of Akshaya Bayatini of Peela village, district Burdwan, where he lived at his maternal uncle's house. True lover of Kavi-songs, he was deeply impressed by the songs of Haru Thakur, whom he regarded as his Guru. He became famous as a Kaviwal, and his love-relation with Akshaya Bayatini, a woman Kaviwal of lower society, earned him a bad name. His maternal uncle Dewan Ram Jiban Chakraborty employed him in his office. He left the job and, ignoring all social obligations, joined the party of Akshaya and became a rival of Nilkanta, the most famous Kaviwal of his time. Dasarathi was not happy with vulgarism which was one of the main traits in the Kaviwal poetry. Once he felt so humiliated by the rivalry with Nidhiram Sunri that he decided to change his line and came to the field of Panchali in the year 1835. In Panchali, the technique was to sing, dance and explain the objects. The subject was mainly religious, but it included the current social topics also. Prior to Dasarathi, Ganganarayan Naskar, Lakshmikanta Biswas and Thakurdas Datta were famous as Panchali poets. But Panchali was modernised and popularised by Dasarathi alone and he was regarded as an outstanding poet in this form. He earned tremendous fame and popularity in his life as a great Panchalikar. The subjects he dealt with were the stories of Krishna, Rama, Shiva and Shakti and the social events of his time. Other than the story-based Panchalis, he composed many songs. The influence of Dasarathi is very much noticeable in the compositions of Rasikchandra Roy, Brajamohan Roy, Manmohan Basu, Krishnadhan Dey, Nandalal Roy and other Panchalikars of the later period.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.P. Chakrabarti, Dasarathi o tanhar panchali; Niranjan Chakrabarti, Unbimsa satabdir panchalikar o Bangla sahitya.

Ni.C.

RAY, DEBI (Bengali; b.1938), along with Shakti Chattopadhyay and Malay Roychoudhury masterminded the 'Hungry coup' in Bengali poetry during the sixties. His lyrics are almost brittle and his feelings are transmitted into anguished dribblets. This might be the reason why subsequently he broke off from the other members of the Group and branched out into a completely new area of his own.

Debi Ray has participated in the programmes of Doordarshan and All India Radio. His poems have been translated into English, Spanish, German, Russian, Urdu, Hindi, Marathi, Oriya, Gujrati and Tamil and published in many magazines and journals in India and abroad.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Debi Ray's published works include Kolkata o ami/Manush, manush (1971), Samprotik tinjan (1973), Debi Royer kabita (1980), Bhrukutir biruddhey eka (1983), Unmad sahar (1984), Ei-sei-tomar desh (1986), Putul nacher gan (1987), Arrogant From Birth (Translated into English, 1978), Srikanta Vermar kabita and Poems by Debi Roy.

He has participated in various poetry seminars, workshops, recitals, meetings, symposia etc, and has been the convener and organiser of the Indian Writers Association.

RAY, DINENDRAKUMAR (Bengali; b. 1869, d. 1943) was born in the village of Meherpur in the district of Nadia, West Bengal. He studied at Mohisadal High School and Krishnanagar College, and was later employed in the court of the District Judge of Rajsahi. He was encouraged by Rajanikanta to translate into Bengali an English edition of a French novel. He spent two years at Baroda (1898-1899), teaching Bengali to Aurobindo.

He became the sub-editor of Basumati in 1900 and then its editor. He was also the editor of a monthly magazine Nandan kanan. He became famous as a detective novelist, introducing the famous detective Robert Blake to his readers in his Rahasya Iahari siriz. The number of novels in this series is about two hundred and seventeen.

The following books written by Dinendrakumar are worth mentioning; Basanti (stories; 1898), Hamida (1899), Pat (detective stories, 1901), Ajoy Singher kuthi (1902), Sachitra arabya upanyas (1902), Palli chitra (1904), Palli baichitra (1905), Chinese Dragon (1914), Nayeb mahasaya (1924) and Dheynkir kirti (1925).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Sahitya sadhak charitmala, Vol. VII (Bangiya Sahitya Parishad); Subodhchandra Sengupta (ed.), Bangali charitabhidhan (Sahitya Samsad).

Pro.S.

RAY, DWIJENDRALAL (Bengali; b.1863, d.1913). Born in a family of affluence and culture in Krishnanagar in the district of Nadia, Dwijendralal Ray developed a talent for music and literature from his very early age. His father Kartikeyachandra Ray was the Dewan of the Raja of Krishnanagar and himself a learned scholar and talented in music. He wrote a history of the Krishnanagar Raj family and his own autobiography which was one of the earliest autobiographies in Bengali literature. Dwijendralal was greatly inspired by his father in delineating some of the ideal characters in his dramas.

In 1884 he went to London on a state scholarship for higher studies in Agricultural Science. But the Hindu society was still very conservative and on his return Dwijendralal found himself ex-communicated by the society and even by his own family. This struck the greatest blow to his life. He wrote a number of satirical poems and farces attacking the Hindu society for its narrow and conservative outlook on social life.

Dwijendralal entered government service and became a Deputy Magistrate. But owing to his independent spirit he could not succeed in his employment. He devoted himself to the writing of poetry, drama and music and this devotion continued till the last day of his life. He died in the midst of an active life.

Dwijendralal started writing poetry from the beginning of his literary career. He wrote on the different aspects of life. He sometimes bitterly criticised the idealism of Rabindranath Tagore whose contemporary he was and younger only by two years. Dwijendralal was not a realist in poetry but a romantic. His satirical poems were mainly attacks on the Hindu caste system, conservatism and untouchability. He resisted the influence of Rabindranath to a great degree with his own original creative force.

Dwijendralal is, however, more popular as a dramatist than as a poet. His dramas can be divided into three groups—mythological-poetic, historical and social. In the mythological-poetic dramas he treats the mythological characters and events in his own way. In his Pashani he retold the episode of Ahalya as found in the Ramayana in a way which created a controversy, since it went against the established social ethics. In his Sita also he gave a new interpretation to Sita's going to the forest after her return from Lanka.

In writing historical plays Dwijendralal had little control over his poetic imagination. Even for a play like Nurjahan, where historical materials were not rare, Dwijendralal did not strictly adhere to historical facts. His dramas, both historical and social, were melodramatic, full of action and poetic dialogues. He is the most successful imitator of Shakespeare in Bengali, but his idea of tragedy was imperfect. As a result he produced melodrama instead of tragedy proper.

Dwijendralal attained considerable success in his historical drama Nurjahan not for being faithful to history, but for his success in analysing the inner conflict in the character of Nurjahan in her encounter with the most acute problem of her life. She did not marry Emperor Jahangir for love, but for taking revenge upon him. Nurjahan's dealings with her husband under abnormal conditions have been very ably delineated by the dramatist from the psychological viewpoint.

Dwijendralal's historical drama Shahjahan was once very popular on the stage. It is full of sensational actions delineating the sad end of the eventful life of the Mughul emperor. The social dramas of Dwijendralal are only few and weak in conception and execution. The songs in his dramas, however, have always a special appeal.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Asutosh Bhattacharaya, Bangla natya sahityer itihas, Vol. II (Calcutta, 1971); Rathindranath Roy, Dwijendralal: kavi o natyakar (Calcutta, 1960).

As.B.

RAY, GOURISHANKAR (Oriya; b. 1838, d. 1917) was born in a Bengali family at Dikshitpara in the district of Cuttack. After receiving informal education in Oriya, Urdu and Persian in his native village, he came to Cuttack for studies, whereafter he joined a college at Hoogly for higher studies. He returned to Orissa, joined the Commissioner's Office, Cuttack, as a clerk, and later rose to be a 'translator' in the Cuttack Collectorate. With the help of a few friends he set up the Cuttack Printing Company and started editing Utkal deepika, a weekly newspaper, for the benefit of the people of Orissa. He was associated with the paper for more than half a century, and is regarded as the father of journalism in Orissa. Utkal deepika became the centre of socio-cultural and political activities in the state. A good number of classical and puranic literature in Orissa, written on palm leaf, was decaying. He collected the material and got it printed with correct reading and notes.

He was a great lover of music and ancient literature of Orissa and made the colloquial language a powerful vehicle of expression and evolved an effective prose style through his editorials. Besides, the ancient Oriya poems edited by him with suitable notes speak of his literary merit. One of the builders of modern Orissa, he ushered in the dawn of a new era through his dedication and ceaseless efforts for half a century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.C. Satpathy, Matru gourab (1933) ; Mrutunjoy Ratha, Karmayogi Gourishankar (1925); Nagendra Kumar Rai, Karmi Gourishankar (Cuttack, 1956); Radhanath Rath, Karmavir Gouri Shankar Roy (Satyabadi Press, 1980).

J.B.M.

RAY, HEMENDRAKUMAR (Bengali; b.1888, d.1963), widely known as an adventure and detective story writer in Bengali, and son of Radhikanath Ray, started his literary career at the age of fourteen. From the very beginning he was deeply associated with almost all the important literary magazines, including Basudha, Janmabhumi, Nabya Bharat, Manasi, Marmabani, Bharati, etc. His first story 'Amar kahini' was published in Basudha in 1903. He used to assist Manilal Ganguli, editor of Bharati, one of the very prestigious literary journals of his time. Hemendrakumar was very much interested in dramatics and music, and was the editor of a theoretical journal, Nachghar. He composed songs and some of them were included in Sita (1924), a play by Jogeshchandra Chaudhuri (1887-1948). He also dramatised Dhrubatara, a novel by Jyotindramohan Sinha in 1931 and it was staged successfully. Hemendrakumar had written a farce, Premer premara which was staged in the Minerva Theatre of Calcutta. He, in the first phase of his literary career, wrote a book of poems consisting of sixty-eight poems. He also translated Omar Khayyam from an English version into Bengali. But his stories and novels were more popular than his other writings, and all such writings were essentially for the adults. In fact, he started writing initially adult-literature only, and began to write for children around 1920 in Mauchak, a children's magazine. His first adventure writing Jaker dhan appeared in it and made him popular with young readers. In fact, he introduced adventure in Bengali literature for the first time in its true sense. He wrote about a hundred books the chief among which are:

Adult writings: Pasra (1915), Madhuchakra (1917), Aleyar alo (1918), Jaler alpana (novel, 1919), Aloklata (1920), Sindur chupri (1921), Mala chandan (1922), Rasakali (novel, 1922), Jhader jatri (1923), Benojal (1924), Sunyatar prem (1932).

Children's writings: Jaker dhan (1920), Abar jaker dhan (1933), Ajab deshe amala (Carroll's Alice in Wonderland adapted, 1934), King Kong 1934, Adrishya manush (HG Wells' The Invisible Man adapted, 1935), Joyantar kirti (1935), Joyantar pratimurti (1935), Dragoner duhswapna (1939), Andhakarer bandhu (1941), Bhut aar adbhut (1943), Manush gara daitya (adaptation of Mrs. Shelley's Frankenstein, 1944), Dersho khokar kanda (1947), Bishal garer dhushaasan (1944), Count of Montikristo (adaptation of Dumas' novel, 1951), Satyikarer Sharlok Homes (1954), Joyantar adventure (1959), Ratrir yatri (1961).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Subodhchandra Sengupta and Anjali Basu, Samsad Bangali charitabhidhan (1976); Sukumar Sen, Bangla sahityer itihas, Vol. IV (1958).

Na.S.

RAY, JAGADANANDA (Bengali; b. 1869, d. 1933) is a well-known scientific prose writer in Bengali. He was educated at Krishnanagar and took teaching as his profession. He came in close contact with Rabindranath Tagore and was employed as an ordinary service man for the Tagore estate in Silaidaha, East Bengal, and later engaged as a private tutor to Rathindranath Tagore, son of Rabindranath who was much pleased with his scientific knowledge and simple method of teaching. Soon Jagadananda was appointed a teacher at the Santiniketan school. Inspired by Tagore, he began writing books mainly for children on scientific matters, but they attracted the adult readers also. With his whole life given to the Visva Bharati School Jagadananda rose to be its first principal. He wrote many books and mostly on science. He kept alive the trend of writing popular scientific prose, which was first started by Akshaykumar Dutta (1820-1886), and developed later by Ramendrasundar Trivedi (1866-1919). His scientific inquisitiveness appeared first in three scientific questions published in Sadhana (1892), edited by Rabindranath. One question was answered by Upendrakishore Raychoudhuri in his article, 'Dipasikha', in the same journal in July 1892. Jagadananda's writings began to appear in almost all leading journals which included the prestigious Bangadarshan, Bharati, Prabasi and Pradip. Though science was his chief subject, he wrote on other subjects also, such as Kanak path (1918), Chutir bai (1932) and Sahitya sopan (1932). He wrote a detective story, Dalil churi, which was awarded the Kuntalin prize in 1903. His other works include: Prakriti parichaya (1911), Prakritiki (1919), Bijnaaner galpa (1920), Gachpala (1921), Baijnaniki (1921), Mach, beng, sap (1925), Bijnan parichaya (1927), Aryakahini (6th ed., 1932), Sabda (1939), Sthir bidyut (1953).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Subodhchandra Sengupta and Anjali Basu (ed.), Samsad charitabhidhan (1976); Sukumar Sen, Bangla sahityer itihas (1958).

Na.S.

RAY, JOGESHCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1859, d. 1956) was an educationist and versatile scholar. He passed the M.A. examination of Calcutta University in 1883 in Botany, and served as lecturer at the Calcutta Madrasa, Presidency College and Chittagong College. Then he joined Ravenshaw College and rose to the position of Professor. He retired in 1919 and settled at Bankura. Throughout his long life Jogeshchandra devoted himself mainly to the study of Hindu astronomy, Bengali grammar, old Bengali literature and Vedic lore, and wrote a large number of books and articles on them and other allied subjects both in English and in Bengali. In recognition of his profound knowledge of Sanskrit in general and Hindu astronomy in particular, the Pandit Sabha of Puri conferred on him the title of 'Vidyanidhi'. The University of Calcutta honoured him with the D. Litt degree (honoris causa) in 1956 at a special convocation held at Bankura. Jogeshchandra was associated all his life with Vangiya Sahitya Parishad in various capacities including its Vice-Presidentship and Presidentship.

Some of his important works are Amader jyotishi o jyotish (Calcutta, 1903); Bangla bhasa—vyakaran (Calcutta, 1910-12); Bangla sabda kosa (Calcutta, 1915); Kshudra o vrhat (essays on science, Calcutta, 1919); The First Point of Asvini (astronomical work, Calcutta, 1934); Chandidas charit (ed, Calcutta, 1937); Ancient Indian Life (Calcutta, 1948); Siksha prakalpa (Calcutta, 1948); Kon pathe (essays, Calcutta, 1952); Pauranik upakhyan (Calcutta, 1954); Ki likhi (essays, Calcutta, 1956); and Puja parvan (Calcutta, 1957).

G.S.

RAY, KALIDAS (Bengali; b. 1889, d. 1975) was a scholar and a Bengali poet of the Rabindra era. He was born in a Vaishnav family, connected to Lochan Das, famous biographer of Srichaitanya. He graduated from Scottish Church College, Calcutta, in 1910. He first started his career as Headmaster at Maharani Swarnamayi School at Ulipur in Rangpur district. As a teacher he served many institutions and finally the Mitra institution (Bhowanipur branch, Calcutta) where he taught until retirement. He received the 'Kabisekhar' title from the Rangpur 'Sahitya Parishat' in 1920, and was awarded 'Jagattarini' and 'Sarojini' gold medals by the University of Calcutta for his works in Bengali. He was admitted to a posthumous Doctoral degree (honoris causa) by Burdwan University. He also received 'Desikottam', the highest degree of Visva Bharati. His first collection of poems Kunda (a kind of flower, in 1908) was not very promising, but the successive collections, Kisalaya (1911), Parnaput (1914), Braja Benu (1915), Ballari (1915), Ritumangal (1916), Kshudkunra (1922), Rasakadamba (1923), Lajanjali (1924), Haimanti (1934), Baikali (1940), etc. bear distinct traits of his poetic life. He was an admirer of poet Rabindranath Tagore. A note of submissiveness as well as an element of 'Bhakti' is found in his poems. His experiences of teaching, social and national problems, household life in Bengal, current events, new interpretations of characters from the epics and personal joys and sorrows are the themes of his poems. In one of his poems 'Seshkatha' the poet says: 'The hope and trust, reminiscence and dream, eternal pain and vision of the heart of the Bengalis have been reflected in my songs.' Rabindranath's valuable observation on this poet is to be noted: 'Your poems are sweet and pleasant like the soil of Bengal. Your mind is full to the brim with deep love for Bengal.' But Kalidas is not only a poet. As a critic also he has a place in Bengali literature. His critical works are original and thought-provoking. Prachin Banga sahitya (vols. I, II & III), Banga sahitya parichaya, Sarat sahitya, Padavali parichaya, Sahitya prasanga (vols. I & II) are his critical works. He was also a good translator and rendered many English poems and Sanskrit kavyas into Bengali.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Asit Banerjee, Adhunik sahityer sankshipta itibritya; Mohitlal Majumdar, Kavya manjusha; Sukumar Sen, Bangla sahityer itihas.

Du.M.

RAY, KAMINI (Bengali; b. 1864, d. 1933), probably the greatest of the women poets who wrote during the first quarter of this century, was born at the village of Vasanda in the district of Bakharganj. Her father was Charucharan Sen, a noted litterateur. In 1881 she passed her B.A. with Honours in Sanskrit from Bethune College, Calcutta, and took to teaching immediately thereafter. In 1898 she was married to Kedarnath Ray, a civilian, who died a year later.

Kamini took to writing poems in her early youth but her first poetical collection, Alo o chhaya, appeared only in 1889. The rest of her works include Nirmalya (1891), Pouraniki (1897), Gunjan (1904), Malya o nirmalya (1913), Ashoksangit (1914) and Jibanpathe (1930). Dip-o-dhup, published in 1929, is an omnibus volume which includes poems from her other works. She also wrote a few brilliant essays, but they never appeared in book form.

In her early works Kamini Ray writes of the romance of youthful love, the hesitancy, the doubt, the hopes and the frustrations of the young woman. Ashoksangit is a collection of sonnets which express the deep sorrow of a mother who has lost her son. Jibanpathe, also a collection of sonnets, is in three parts: Sahajatra, Ekela and Jhara phul. Most of these sonnets ruminate over the amours of lost youth and loneliness. Pouraniki contains one short play on Ekalavya and two poems, 'Dhrishtadyumner prati Drona' and 'Ramer prati Ahalya'. In the later poems she adopts a moralistic tone and her style becomes increasingly aphoristic.

Unlike most other poets of her time, Kamini Ray shuns effusiveness and exhibits remarkable restraint, even when she is expressing intensely personal emotion. Her language is simple, shorn of all ornaments, but it always bears the stamp of her sincerity.

An.C.

RAY, KIRANSHANKAR (Bengali; b. 1891, d.1948), the renowned author of Saptaparna (1949), was born in the district of Dacca, now in Bangladesh. He graduated with Honours in History from Oxford and became Professor of History at Presidency College and Sanskrit College, Calcutta. He was imprisoned for his involvement in the Civil Disobedience Movement in 1929. When India won independence, he became the Home Minister of West Bengal.

Saptaparna is a collection of Kiranshankar's short stories, initially printed in the Sabuj patra founded in 1914 and edited by Pramatha Chaudhuri. The periodical was encouraged largely by Rabindranath for creating something new and at the same time expressing the radical changes appearing in the life of Bengal. Kiranshankar's writings are polished, his language attractive and his taste cultivated, though his experience was limited. His stories, on the whole, were emotional and poetic, and were built purely upon the imagination. He had, however, a natural tendency to create incidents and characters and invent the basic ingredients for a successful short story. The significant fact about his stories is the creation of a new language for fiction which emphasised the use of natural expression. Saptaparna, indeed, stands out boldly as an important reflection of the new trends in life and literature as well as a significant contribution to the literay history of the period.

Pro. S.

RAY, MANINDRA (Bengali; b. 1919) is a leading Bengali poet of the forties. A graduate in 1940 of Calcutta University, he came in close contact with the world of cinema as an Assistant Director. From 1961 he served for about two decades as the Joint Editor of the Bengali weekly Amrita. Recipient of the Sahitya Akademi Award for his long poem Mohini adal (Enchanting veil) in 1959 and of the Soviet Land Nehru Award in 1970, he is a prolific writer of poetry. His important books of verses are Trisanku Madan (The dangling Cupid, 1939), Ek Chakshu (The one-eyed, 1942), Chhayasahachar (The shadow companion, 1944), Setubandher gan (The song of bridge-building 1948), Krishnachura (1955), Amil theke mile (From the rhymeless to rhyme, 1958), Mukher mela (A fair of faces 1959), Atidur alorekha (The distant line of light) and Jamaye rakter dag (The shirt with blood-spots, 1977). Writer of two poetic dramas, he has also edited two anthologies of poems. He has recently published his memoirs about contemporaries.

As.S.

RAY, MANMATH (Bengali; b. 1869) was born in the district of Mymensing (now in Bangladesh) and educated at the universities of Calcutta and Dacca. Even before the end of his academic life his dramas were staged at professional theatres in Calcutta. He has written more than one hundred dramas in Bengali, covering diverse themes—mythological, romantic, historical, social and political. Above all, he introduced the modern form of the one-act play into Bengali literature. His dramas are generally action-packed, fast-moving, directly expressive and objective. He readily responds to topical situations. Even when he treats mythological themes like the fight between the gods and the demons, he symbolizes India's struggle for independence against the British regime. To a great extent he modernized the conventional mythological themes in his plays which caught the popular imagination to a great extent. For his contribution to dramatic literature he was awarded the honorary degree of D. Litt. by two universities of West Bengal.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

His major works include Muktir dak (1924), Chand sadagar (1927), Karagar (1930), Mahabharati (1943) and Ekankika (one-act plays, 1955).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Asutosh Bhattacharyya, Bangla natya sahityer itihas, Vol. II (Calcutta, 1971); Sadhan Kumar Bhattacharyya and Ajit Kumar Ghosh (ed.), Ekanka sanchayan (Calcutta, 1960).

As.B.

RAY, NIHARRANJAN (Bengali/English; b. 1903), scholar, art-critic, historian and writer with a wide perspective, took his M.A. in Ancient History, Culture and Archaeology from the University of Calcutta in 1926 and later became the Bagiswari Professor of Indian History, Art and Culture at Calcutta University. He took his D. Litt. from the University of Leyden in 1936. He wrote several books on Buddhism: Brahmanical Gods in Burma (1932), Sanskrit Buddhism in Burma (1936), Theravada Buddhism in Burma (1937), and Maurya and Sunga Art (1945) in which he tried to relate art to general and social activity. His Rabindra sahitya bhumika (An introduction to Rabindranath's literature, 1941), and Bangalir itihas: adi parba (1949), for which he received the Rabindra Award in 1951, are important works in Bengali. He also wrote a book on Tagore in English, entitled An Artist in Life, which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1969. He was Professor at the University of Washington, St. Louis, U.S.A. in 1952, and later a visiting Professor to many western and eastern Universities. He received the national honour of 'Padmabhushan' in 1962. He also served as Director of the Indian Institute of Advanced Study, Simla, for a period of five years (1965-70). Recipient of many honours and awards in India and abroad and a close associate of Rabindranath, Niharranjan had a long association with the Asiatic Society, the Jnanpith and many other literary and cultural organisations.

Na.S.

Niharranjan was a scholar of wide range and acute sensitivity. Apart from his contribution to historical studies and art criticism, he wrote with a sense of discernment in Bengali and English. His Bangalir itihas gives a comprehensive picture of life involving the whole population, concentrating particularly on the lower and wider strata of society—a study of the people, dealing with life as caught in the historical perspective and socio-political changes and in religious practice, art and literature.

Niharranjan had written for several periodicals in Bengali on Tagore before his Rabindra sahitya bhumika was published. This book-length study was an extended version of his earlier essays with some new writings added to them. Here was an attempt to analyse Tagore's works in a historical perspective, bringing out the interaction of his environment and literary works. The study of Rabindranath was taken up again in An Artist in Life on a more comprehensive scale. The Sahitya Akademi's citation on the book read: 'For its deep insight into the many facets of the genius and personality of the myriad-minded poet, for its masterly analysis and lucid exposition, the work has been hailed as an outstanding contribution to contemporary Indian writing in English.'

Sh.Ba.

RAY, NIKHILNATH (Bengali; b. 1865, d. 1932), eminent historian, graduated in 1892 and passed his B.L. in 1897. He started his career as a lawyer in Berhampur and thereafter moved to the High Court in Calcutta. Later, he became the Naib of Cossimbazar.

His first work was a book of poems called Rajput kusum (1884) in which he depicted the lives and heroic deeds of twelve Rajput heroes. Among his other works are Asruhar (A garland of tears, 1886), Dr. Ramdas Sen (a biography, 1886), Murshidabad kahini (1887), Mahabharat-anukramanika (1907), Itikatha (1908), Kabikatha (Parts I and II), and Prithviraj. He edited the Aaitihasik chitra for seven years, the Swasti for four years and Pallibani for a few years.

Ni.C.

RAYA, PRATAPA (Oriya; later 16th c.), as his family surname suggests, came from a Kṣhatriya family. It is possible that he came from the densely forested north-western region of Orissa, the homeland of Tantric Buddhism. He sings of Lord Jagannath as of the Buddha. He belonged to the Vaishnavite Shishu sect founded by Ananta Dasa of Panchasakha fame.

The only work attributed to Pratapa Raya is Shashisena, published in 1929 by the Prachi Samiti. It is an 'akhyayika' kavya in fourteen cantos, composed in different metres, and named after its heroine Princess

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Shashisena who, as a class-fellow of Ahimanikya, the Serpent King's son, in disguise of a man and brought up as a foster-son by the minister of the land, is secretly wedded to him. The lovers flee from the city to unknown forests encountering demons on their way. In the Kamakshya country the handsome Ahimanikya is turned into a lamb by the witchcraft of Jnanada Maluni. The helpless Shashisena, disguised as a man, wins the king's favour by killing a deadly rhinoceros, and cleverly rescues Ahimanikya from his confinement. The man-Shashisena also wins as a reward Princess Chandrabali who marries Ahimanikya and becomes his second bride.

One day urged on by his wives, Ahimanikya most reluctantly discloses his identity as Hali, the Serpent King's son, and disappears into the land of the Nagas. Shashisena worships the seven Mayakumaris (powerful supernatural beings) who help her reach the land of the Nagas where by the grace of goddess Bisheheri, whom she pleases with her sweet songs, she meets Ahimanikya restored to her.

Pratapa Raya writes in the puranic style. His work is remarkable for its rich descriptive passages and clever use of figures of speech. Like Chata Ichhabati it is unique in so far as its story was drawn from an indigenous folk tale of Orissa, which had attained a marked degree of popularity in Bengal.

BIBLIOGRAPHY; Artaballabha Mahanti, Shashisena (1929); Surendra Mahanti, Odia sahityara madhyaparba (1967).

G.C.U.

RAY, RADHANATH (Oriya; b. 1848, d. 1908) is fondly described as the father of the new era of Oriya literature. He lost his mother at the age of eight, an event which left him melancholy and desolate. A brilliant student, he passed the Entrance examination from the Balasore High English School and was admitted to Presidency College, Calcutta. But ill health and poverty compelled him to give up studies and join the Balasore High English School as a teacher in 1864.

In 1869, while he was working as a teacher, he passed the Intermediate Examination. Then this he worked at the Puri Zila school. At Puri his acquaintance with Madhusudan Rao, a promising and brilliant student of the School, subsequently turned to be a life-long literary friendship. In 1872 he became Deputy Inspector of Schools of the Balasore district. It was because of his encouragement and inducement that the first monthly literary journal of Orissa, the Utkal darpan, was published from Balasore under the patronage of his friend, Prince Baikunthanath De. Ray proved to be a devoted officer and was made Joint Inspector of Schools of Orissa, which was then part of Bengal.

Radhanath's creative genius flourished in poetry, essay and translation for a period of over forty years. His poems created a tradition with a new outlook, and profoundly influenced many a young poet and writer of subsequent years. Radhanath's art is a treasure-house of various themes and experiences, and his poems give probably the most graphic account of Orissa and its manifold beauties.

His first poems were written in Bengali. A collection of these appeared in 1873 under the title Kabitabali. Subsequently, as a part of the new wave in Oriya literature, and in a way promoting it, he turned to Oriya and became the first important modern poet of Oriya literature. Within a period of sixteen years from 1880 he wrote his famous kavyas: Kedar Gouri (1886), Chandrabhaga (1886), Nandikeswari (1887), Usha (1888), Parvati (1891), Chilika (1892), Mahayatra (1893), Darbar (1896) and Jajati Keshari (1898), as well as an excellent translation of Meghaduta.

Radhanath released Oriya poetry from conventional style, rhythms and old bondages. He used a language varied and easily understood by readers. He rejected play on word as a poetic device and simplified the poetic diction. He often used colloquial words which add to the strength of the language. He used figures of speech such as alliteration, simile, metaphor and hyperbole, but only sparingly. He was the first poet in Oriya to use blank verse in his incomplete Mahajatra.

Oriya literature before Radhanath seldom reflected the local colour. He is the first major poet to turn to the scenic beauty of rural Orissa. His description of lakes, rivers, and valleys of Orissa were extremely appealing and colourful. The description of the beautiful lake, Chilika, in the poem of the same name, the Mahanadi Valley in Mahajatra, the descriptions of Puri and Balasore in Chandrabhaga and Usha are rich in colour and detail.

Radhanath is also regarded as the first prose essayist and writer of travelogue in modern Oriya literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: D.C. Roy (ed.), Radhanath jeebani, D.P. Patnaik, Kabilipi (Visva Bharati, Santineketan); N. Samant Roy, Juga srasta Radhanath; P. Acharya, Radhanathanka ananya pratibha.

J.B.M.

RAY, RAJKISHORE (Oriya; b. 1914), essayist, short-story writer, critic and dramatist, was born in a middle-class family in the village of Chhatabar, district Puri. He holds M.A. degrees in both Oriya and English, and has taught at various colleges in Orissa. His story collections include Neela lahari (Blue wave, 1940), Ashoka chakra (The wheel of Ashoka, 1944), Jayashri (Victory, 1947), Manara mrunala (Lotus of the mind, 1952), Shonita kavya (The song of blood, 1954), Adi purusha (The primitive man, 1960), Panka chandana (Mud and sandal paste, 1963), Ehi ki devayatana (Is this a temple, 1973), Bikacha satadala (The full-blown lotus), Madhyarnara marupathe (On the desert at mid-day) and Jeevana sangita (The song of life). Ray was a prominent story writer in the forties and the fifties, and continuously wrote in leading literary journals such as Sankha, Chaturanga, Sahakara and Nava-Bharata. Though his influence as a story writer has declined recently, Ray is still writing.His early stories such as 'Kalinga shilpi' (The artist from Kalinga) are highly romantic in theme and ornate in style. Later, Roy showed an awareness of contemporary social evils—poverty, class-struggle, corruption, prostitution, and so on. Some of his stories, such as 'Acharya thile boli' (But for the Acharya) and 'Bouli', show his remarkable sense of humour and satire. Ray has a commendable sense of dialogue and economy of expression, but his ornate style sometimes seems too pretentious to portray the life of the lower-middle class. However, he offers his readers a variety of themes and is competent to turn any trivial incident of life into a story.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Rajkishore Ray has been associated with many literary organisations. He was Secretary of the Orissa Sahitya Academy and later its Vice-President, and subsequently Vice-President of the State Sangeet Natak Academy.

Ga.M.

RAY, RAJKRISHNA (Bengali; b.1849, d.1894), the first Bengali who made writing his means of livelihood, wrote much more than any of his contemporaries. He was at once a poet, playwright, story-teller, actor, translator and editor.

Today Rajkrishna's reputation rests on his plays. His first play, Patibrata, appeared in 1875. His other plays include Haradhanu bhanga, Prahlad-charitra, Baman-bhiksha and Naramedha yagna. He wrote most of his plays for the Bengal National, the Bina, and the Star theatres.

Haradhanu bhanga was written in five or six days on a request from some actors of the Bengal Theatre. In this play he employed a new metre which came to be known as the 'Gairish chhanda.'

Rajkrishna Ray also wrote some lyrical plays and farces. Of his lyrical plays, Laila Majnu (1892) and Benazir Badre Munir (1893) bore the influence of French stories. Some of his farces were staged at the Bina Theatre which he had founded. Of his farces Dwadash Gopal (1878), Daktarbabu (1890), Ballune bangali bibi (1890) and Juju (1890) are well-known.

Most of his writings are in verse. Abasar sarojini in two parts, published in 1876 and 1879, is his most famous collection of poems. Other collections are Giri sandarshan (1870), Agamani (1871), Nibhrita nibas (1878), etc. Bangabhushan (1874) is an anthology of sonnets celebrating many famous personalities from Ballal Sen to Michael Madhusudan Dutt. He wrote a number of songs which appeared in two collections Bharatgan (1878) and Gan (1888) which were extremely popular in his time.

His multifarious interests and acquaintance with various subjects are proved by his Bharatkosh (1880-92) written in collaboration with Saratchandra Dev. It is a volume dealing with the puranas, art, philosophy, religion, medicine, astrology, etc. He also wrote Rusiar itihas (1885), a history of Russia. He translated the Mahabharata and the Ramayana in Bengali verse. James Macpherson's Poems of Ossian were partially translated as Ashwayaner kavitavali.

Most of his poems have an undercurrent of nationalism. They reflect his sorrow at India under foreign domination. He was good at writing prose as well. He wrote a few novels and short stories. Mention should be made of Hiranmayi (1880), Kiranmayi (1881) and Pratiphal (1893).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brajendranath Bandyopadhya, Sahitya sadhak charitramala, Vol. IV; Satyendranath Thakur, Amar balyakatha (Bharati); Sukumar Sen, Bangla sahityer itihas, Vol. II.

C.L.

RAY, RAMSHANKAR (Oriya; b. 1838, d. 1917) was born in a Bengali family of Orissa, and had his schooling at the village school, where he acquired some knowledge of Oriya rhetoric and prosody. Afterwards, he studied at a Bengali High School at Cuttack, and at Ravenshaw College from where he graduated. He started his career as a clerk, but soon he studied law and became a lawyer.

In 1875, when he was editor of Utkal madhupa, an Oriya monthly magazine, his 'Prematari', a long poem, was serialized. He started writing two novels, Saudamini and Unmadini, for the journals Utkal madhupa and Indradhanu but left them incomplete.

A Bengali drama, Ramabhiseka, inspired him to write plays in Oriya. In fact, he became the first playwright in Oriya. His purpose was didactic. He studied the Vedas, the Smriti, the Ramayana, the Mahabharata, the Bhagavata, Chaitanya-charitamrita and Gitagovinda. He borrowed stories from ancient literature and turned them into popular dramas. He adopted the structure of western plays and was the first in Oriya to use blank verse in Kanchi Kaveri. He also used Hindustani 'ragas' and

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

'raginis' for embellishment. Ramshankar dominated the scene of Oriya drama for thirty-seven years from 1880 to 1917, and set a new trend, which influenced later dramatists like Veer Vikram Dev, Padmanav Narayan Dev, Bhikaricharan Patnaik and Kamapala Mishra.

Ramshankar has seventeen works to his credit. Among them ten are plays: Kanchi Kaveri (1882), Vanavala (1882), Ramavanavasa (1891), Yugadharma (1892), Kamsavadha (1896), Visamodaka (1900), Kanchanmali (1904), Chaitanyalila (1906), Lilavati (1912) and Ramabhisheka (1917); two dance dramas : Badaloka (1913) and Visva yagna (1916); and two farces : Kalikala (1883) and Budhavara (1892). The historical and mythological plays of Ramshankar reveal his genius. He also wrote a novel called Bibasini (1891) which was published in Utkal prabha and became very popular.

A.P.

RAY, SATYAJIT (Bengali, b.1922), the versatile film-maker of international repute, was born at Calcutta. His father Sukumar Ray, Bengal's most loved humorist and writer of nonsense verse and stories for children, died when Satyajit was a mere child. He studied at Presidency College and learned fine arts with Nandalal Basu at Santiniketan. In 1943, he joined a British advertising agency as a junior visualiser and worked for twelve years before he ventured into the world of films with a trilogy beginning with Pather panchali.

Ray combines in himself a multiplicity of roles–book illustrator, cover designer, typographer, music composer, translator and editor of children's magazine. His literary career began in 1961 with the revival of Sandesh, a children's magazine, first founded by his grandfather Upendrakishore Raychoudhury in 1913. Most of his stories and novellas were first written for it and for Desh. With Badshahi angti (The Imperial ring, 1975), Ray broke new grounds in the genre of detective fiction. In Baksha rahasya (The mystery of the box, 1974), Kailashe kelenkari (Scandal in Kailash, 1974), Sonar kella (The golden fortress, 1976), Bombayer Bombete (The buccaneer of Bombay, 1977), Golokdhame rahasya (Mystery at Golok Lodge, 1981) and Gorosthane sabdhan (Trouble in the graveyard, 1979) he continued the trend and almost perfected it. As in the Victorian crime-thrillers where we find the pairing of the sleuth with a not-too-acute assistant, Ray pairs the incomparable sleuth Feluda with a green horn, his own cousin Tapesh Ranjan alias Topse, a boy of about fourteen. Besides, Ray introduces Lalmohan Ganguli alias Jatayu, a rolly-polly and naive writer of cheap thrillers. Both of them serve as a kind of foil to Feluda. Jatayu also provides comic relief by supplying dollops of humour with his eccentricity and naivete. Feluda, urbane and intellectually inclined, a charminar-brand cigarette in his mouth, solves the mystery a laf Sherlock Holmes. With each novella changes the locale and the landscape and Ray, with a connoisseur's relish, changes the nature of the crime too.

In the stories of the Shonku series Sabash Professor Shonku (Bravo Professor Shonku, 1974), Professor Shonkur kandakarkhana (Antics of Professor Shonku, 1984), Mahashankate Shonku (Shonku in great danger, 1985), Ray's talents as a science fiction writer come to the fore. Professor Shonku is a scientific prodigy and rubs shoulders with the greatest personalities of the world but prefers to work in the quiet of his Giridih laboratory. He has an innocent, loyal servant on whom he tries out, Holmes-like, his scientific ideas. Ray himself sees Shonku as a tamed version of Conan Doyle's Professor Challenger.

Ek dajan gappa (A dozen stories, 1975) is the first of his twelve story collections, followed by Aro baro (Another twelve, 1981), Aro ek dajan (Another one dozen, 1983), Ebaro baro (Twelve this time too, 1984) and Eker pithe dui (Two behind one). Each contains twelve stories dealing with mystery, crime and the supernatural. Though there is no conscious or obvious didacticism in them, the stories, besides giving us joy, project a certain vision of the world and offer valuable insight into some deeper aspects of life. In 'Khagam' Dhurjati Babu, the central character, is metamorphosed into a snake as a punishment for his 'modern' scepticism. At the end of the story 'Asamanja Babur kukur', Asamanjababu's remark, 'My dog is laughing because the gentleman thinks money can buy everything', holds a mirror up to a materialistic and acquisitive society that thinks everything can be bartered away for money. 'Brihachchanchu', though ostensibly about a monster-bird, symbolises the way society renders impotent the greatest talent in an individual. 'Sadhanbabur sandeha', while providing us with a good laugh, brings out the schizophrenia of the central character.

In some of the stories like 'Sadanander khude jagat' (The tiny world of Sadananda) and 'Pikur diary' (Piku's diary) published in the volume Pikur diary o anyanya (1986), Ray shows a remarkable insight into the psychological and psycho-analytical processes of his characters. 'Pikur diary' is a striking illustration of free writing. Ray dispenses with traditional rules of punctuation, spelling and syntax and writes as a boy of seven or eight would. 'Sadanander khude jagat' depicts how a child, confined to his room because of sickness, creates an entirely subjective world for himself by empathising with the tiny objects and creatures around him. These stories are striking for their innate lyricism and the use of a technique which is close to the stream of consciousness.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Bishay chalachchitra (On films, 1976) and Our films, their films record Ray's reflections on different aspects of film-making. Together they form one of the most articulate bodies of analysis of the subject ever written. Jokhon choto chilam (When I was a child, 1984) is an account of the author's childhood experience and the extraordinary range of people he came into contact with, and gives a clue to the diversely gifted personality of Ray. The language used by him bears the stamp of his personality. It is simple, pithy and terse, shorn of any verbal ornamentation and displays his professed distaste for 'erudition'. A recipient of over a hundred national and international awards, Satyajit Ray is an institution by himself.

Mo.A.

RAY, SHASHIBHUSAN (Oriya; b. 1874, d. 1954), the eldest son of the poet Radhanath Ray, was a distinguished essayist and travelogue-writer. He passed his Entrance examination in the year 1891, but could not prosecute higher studies on account of epilepsy. The physical handicap, however, did not affect in the least his literary activities and achievements. In 1914 he became Secretary of the Utkal Sahitya Samaj and continued in that office till 1939.

Shashibhusan had an unfailing love for nature and wandered far and wide in different parts of Orissa. Communication was difficult in those days but he would even travel in bullock-carts. He wrote three travelogues; Dakshinatya bhramana (Travelling in the Deccan, 1896), Aryabarta darshana (A view of northern India, 1911) and Kanika darshana (A view of Kanika). They are full of beautiful descriptions of nature besides being a commentary on the geographical and historical importance of the places, social customs and practices of the people. His essays show deep personal involvement in a romantic vein with a sharp eye to details. They are written in a style which is almost poetry in prose. These are 'Utkalara rituchitra' (Beauty of Orissa in different seasons), 'Utkal prakriti' (Nature in Orissa), 'Kumuda pahadare aparahna' (Afternoon on the Kumuda hill), 'Panchadharare basantotsaba' (Spring festival at the Panchadhara), 'Antiare sarat sandhya' (An autumnal evening at Antia), 'Nibhrita nilayare shrabana sandhya' (Rainy evening in the solitary abode) and 'Kushabarar atmakatha' (An autobiography of Kushabara).

One of his books shows his devotion and gratitude to his father and bears the name Pitrusmriti (In memory of my father). His autobiography which was serialized in the magazine, Satyabadi, during 1950 remained incomplete. One of his most remarkable writings which has remained yet unpublished in book form is 'Bikshiptachinta' (Diverse thoughts) which was serialised in the Utkal sahitya for twenty-five long years.

P.P.

RAY, SUKUMAR (Bengali; b. 1887, d. 1923) was the eldest son of Upendrakishore Raychoudhuri, pioneer of fine printing and children's literature in Bengali. Born in Calcutta and educated at City School and Presidency College, Calcutta, he graduated with double honours in Chemistry and Physics in 1908 and was awarded the Guruprasanna Ghosh scholarship by the University of Calcutta. He proceeded to England in 1911 to study photography and printing technology at the Manchester School of Technology. He returned home in 1913, and joined the family printing and publishing firm. Upendrakishore died in 1915 and Sukumar had to take charge of the firm and also edit the excellent children's monthly Sandesh, started by his father in 1913. Though Sukumar wrote some masterly articles on art, language and photography, he devoted himself almost wholly to children's literature. Like his father, he was born an artist and a humorist.

Sukumar began his literary career at the age of nine with the publication of two poems in the children's paper Mukul in 1896. His greatest service to Bengali literature was to give humour literary dignity. His extraordinary sense of the comic and the ridiculous was evident from early childhood and it influenced his whole philosophy of life. His humour was sharp but without malice, and his masterly use of language is an example to be followed.

He used ordinarily modern spoken Bengali in his poems, plays and stories. His illustrations were a revelation to other artists of the power of images, a characteristic that later influenced his son Satyajit in film-making. He was an admirer of Rabindranath Tagore but stuck to his own diction and dialogue. His seven plays reveal his dramatic talent. Unfortunately, his untimely death cut short a career of great promise. He composed devotional songs of a high order in sharp contrast to his humorous works. Friends and admirers remembered with nostalgia his homely Nonsense Club, where some highly gifted people regularly met to discuss literature or stage plays composed by Sukumar. His important works include Atiter chhabi (1922), a serious review in verse, of the past ideals of Bengal; Abol tabol (1923), a collection of humorous poems with remarkable illustrations by the author; Ha-ja-ba-ra-la (1924), a serial in Sandesh—a veritable riot in nonsense and inimitable dialogue; Paglaadashu (1940), humorous stories for school-boys with illustrations; Bahurupee (1944); Jhala pala (1945) containing seven incomparable plays; Abak jalpan and Hingshuti, both children's plays. A good number of his poems, stories and articles, hitherto unpublished in book form, have been recently published in two volumes by Satyajit Ray. He has also left behind an incomparable book of essays in prose and verse, entitled Varna mala tattwa, as well as a number of delightful letters, notes, etc.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Samagra shishu sahitya—Sukumar (1977); Bharat kosh, Vol. 5 (Bangiya Sahitya Parishat); Alor phulki (Department of Information and Cultural Affairs, Government of West Bengal, 1980).

L.M.

RAY: Also see under ROY.

RAYAPASENIYA (Prakrit) is a canonical work in Ardhamagadhi. According to Jaina Shvetambaras, the whole canonical literature is divided into eleven angas (divisions), twelve upangas (sub-divisions), six chheda sutras (penal code formulas), four mulasutras (original formulas), ten prakirnakas (miscellaneous formulas) and two chulikas (later formulas). Rayapaseniya consists of two parts and 217 sutras. The commentary on this work was written in the 12th century AD by Malayagiri. The text is composed in the form of conversation between king Pradeshi and the Jaina saint Keshi. Scholars consider that king Payesi or Pradeshi is, in fact, the historical king Prasenjita who was the ruler of Koshala.

In the first part of the text, the life of Suryabhadeva, who was a devotee of Lord Mahavira, is narrated. In the second part of the text the previous births of Suryabhadeva are described in detail. Suryabhadeva, in his previous birth as Pradeshi, had met shramana Keshi who was the principal disciple of Lord Parshvanatha. He (Pradeshi) asked saint Keshi about the existence of the soul. The saint enlightened him on the various problems of life—the difference between matter and soul, self-knowledge and phenomenal knowledge, etc. At last the king acquired inner light and samyaktva (right faith), with the result that he became Suryabhadeva in his next birth.

Apart from being informative, the work possesses various literary qualities. It is stated in the work that Suryabhadeva had presented before Lord Mahavira various arts, such as drama, music and sculpture. He had staged before Lord Mahavira thirty-two types of drama. It contains commentaries on the art of writing, the principles of politics, seventy-two forms of arts etc. The story is unfolded through the medium of dialogue which was later developed into the art of narration, story-telling and drama.

D.S.

RAYCHOUDHURI, PRAMATHANATH (Bengali; b. 1873, d. 1949) was born in a family of landed aristocracy at Santosh in the district of Mymensingh, tracing its descent from Maharaja Pratapaditya of the Mughal period. Pramathanath lost his father when he was nearly eight and was tutored at home by Bhavani Charan Ghosh (1862-1925), himself a novelist. Manmohan Ghose, elder brother of Sri Aurobindo and a poet and teacher of English at Presidency College, taught him Shakespeare, which aroused his interest in Bengali theatre, histrionics and play writing.

Pramathanath was the best known minor poet in Bengal when Rabindranath Tagore dominated the scene. Though a follower of Rabindranath, he was scarcely successful in assimilating the literary and aesthetic ideas of Tagore. He is very often sentimental and also careless of the metrical pattern and sometimes even prosaic in his versification. He had close personal contact with Tagore and Dwijendralal Ray, but his temperamental affinity was more with the latter. While the influence of Bankim can best explain his puritan and nationalistic outlook, the influence of Dwijendralal is mainly discernible in his plays. As a poet, the peak of his creativity extended from 1898 to 1905; later, he took keen interest in theatre and set up a dramatic club at his native place, Santosh. He was associated with the Bangiya Sahitya Parisat and in 1901 became one of its trustees.

Padma (1898), his first published work, was a collection of fifty-five poems. The number of poems rose to sixty-two in the second edition. As a poet, he was rather fanciful than imaginative. Some poems of Tagore's Manasi (1890) seem to have been the main source of his inspiration. Soon, he published Yamuna (1900) and Dipali (1901). Gan, containing texts and notations of his twenty-five songs, was published in 1902 and so also Arati and Dipti. His sonnets, as contained in Giti (1902), testify to his unwillingness to follow any particular rhyme-scheme of a rigid stanza-form. He simply arranged fourteen metrical lines, forming seven rhymed couplets. Gouranga (1902) was an ambitious work and earned him some fame. Divided into six cantos, it portrays the life of Chaitanya and lays emphasis on the human elements of his personality. In 1905, he published Galpa and Gatha, both containing ballads. 1905 saw the spark of people's discontent and protest, rapidly turning into widespread fiery outbursts against Curzon's policy of partitioning Bengal. Pramathanath was also emotionally stirred and in Deshabhakti (1905) recorded his love for the motherland. Two editions of the book, though not of a high literary value, sold out within a short period. This forced the government to proscribe it. Soon came a barren period in his life when he gave up writing, but the poet's voice was again heard in 1913, when came out Gairik and his first drama, Bhagyachakra. Three volumes of his collected poems were edited by Jaladhar Sen and were published during 1915-16 under the title Kavya granthavali. Pathar (1914), Patheya (1916), Taj (1921) and Nila (1930) showed his declining power. On his wife's death he spoke in a whispering voice in Smaran (1937) but soon his voice choked.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Apart from Bhagyachakra he wrote four other plays, Hamir (1915), later named Chitoroddhar, Akkel selami (1916), Jay parajay (1918) and Dilli adhikar (1924). Some of his plays were staged in Calcutta theatres. His prose works include two short stories and a few articles and book reviews, all published in periodicals.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ajoy Kumar Ghosh, Rabindra-samakalin kayekjan kavi: jivan o kavya (Calcutta, 1981); Sukumar Sen, Bangala sahityar itihas, Vol. IV (Calcutta, 1971).

J.R.

RAYCHOUDHURI, SAROJKUMAR (Bengali; b. 1903, d. 1972), eminent novelist and writer of short stories, graduated from Calcutta University and took to journalism. He worked for two dailies, Krishak and Navasakti, after which he joined the Anandabazar Patrika. Later, he edited two literary journals, Vartaman and Anukta. His best known novels are a trilogy called Mayurakshi, Grihakapoti and Somlata which appeared between 1935 and 1938. Portrayed against the background of the Vaishnava Bairagi-sect, the trilogy deals with the family-life of Rasamoy, Gaurhari and Lalita. They provide a realistic picture of the life of the peasants of Rarh or western Bengal. In the novels which he wrote in the forties, Kalo ghora (The black horse), Satabdir abhishap (The curse of the century) and Anushtup chhanda (The anushtup metre) he is concerned with middle class Bengalis. In Kalo ghora he draws his portrait against the background of the Second World War. Srimanta, the hero, comes from a low level in society and quickly moves to the top. He buys the house of his former master and earns a lot during the days of the Bengal Famine of 1943. His actions are immoral but that does not prevent Indrani, the daughter of his former master to admire him. Srimanta is the representative of the middle class in Bengal during the forties. In Anushtup chhanda the novelist portrays the love of an unattached elderly couple. We are shown their inner life and an unexpected romance at the twilight of life. Sarojkumar Raychoudhuri will also be remembered for a few short stories and a bunch of thought provoking essays on men and society.

A.M.

RAYCHOUDHURI, UPENDRAKISHORE (Bengali; b.1863, d.1915), second son of Shyamsundar Ray, was a fine scholar of Bengali, Arabic, Persian and Sanskrit. In his childhood he was called Kamodaranjan, but when a distant uncle, Sriharikishore Raychoudhuri, adopted him, he was renamed Upendrakishore. The boy had his early education at his native village, and graduated from Presidency College, Calcutta, in 1884. He showed early promise in arts and creative writing, with an equal aptitude for music and science. His first literary appearance was with a prose writing in 1883. It was about a fly (macchi) which appeared in Sakha, a children's monthly, edited by Pramadacharan Sengupta. Later, in 1913, he brought out a prestigious children's magazine, Sandesh. His inventive brain produced a new and more developed method of block making for printing, and his technique of halftone for illustrations received wide recognition and his name was recorded in the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

Upendrakishore's love of music was no less and he was a composer and notation-maker of repute. His 'Jago purabasi' (Get up citizens) became a popular Brahama sangeet. Some of his articles on music were published in Prabasi (monthly). His mastery over the other arts was also remarkable, and his use of water colour and oil in painting and other western methods were widely admired. He illustrated Tagore's long poem, Nadi, with seven drawings, and was also the illustrator for Sitadevi and Santadevi's Hindustani upakatha (1912).

Upendrakishore was geared to the lofty tradition of the Raychoudhuri family. He inspired a whole band of writers and artists, musicians and scientists, including his son Sukumar Ray, daughter Sukhalata Ray and grandson, Satyajit Ray, the famous film-maker. He did not write many books, but his mythological stories retold are superb in presentation with self-drawn illustrations. His other works include Sekaler katha (1903), Chheleder Ramayana (1907), Chheleder Mahabharata (1909), Tuntunir bai (1910) and Chhotoder Ramayana (1911).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Asha Ganguli, Bangla shishu sahityer kramavikas (1961); Lila Mazumdar, Upendrakishore Raychoudhuri (1969).

Na.S.

RAYMANGAL (Bengali) is a late-middle-period Bengali 'Mangal' kavya which glorifies Dakshin Ray (The Lord of the South), the presiding deity of the Sundarvans. Dakshin Ray is iconographically represented by the figure of a soldier carrying a gun and riding a full-size Royal Bengal tiger. He is worshipped annually on the last day of the month of Paush (December-January) by the villagers who generally go deep into the forest for their livelihood, collecting honey, wood, dry leaves and other articles.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

They mostly enter the forest on country boats. Casual worship is also performed on mounds of earth under the shade of a tree or in places considered sacred to the deity. Such worship is thought necessary for protection from possible attacks from tigers.

It is generally on the occasion of the annual worship that Raymangal is narrated in accompaniment with music while the villagers keep vigil throughout the night. The theme in brief is as follows:

Ratai Baulya of Bardaha was employed by a merchant to construct some vessels. He entered the Sundarvans by boat with his six brothers and his only son in order to collect wood. There they hewed the trees and loaded seven boats. As they got ready to return, they caught sight of a big tree which was the abode of Dakshin Ray, and felled it. This incensed the deity who ordered his attendants to kill the six brothers of Ratai Baulya but spare him and his son.

The six brothers were done to death by the tigers. Overwhelmed with grief Ratai asked his son to return home, but himself wanted to commit suicide, when a voice from heaven revealed that the retribution had come from Dakshin Ray since the brothers had felled the tree which was his abode. Dakshin Ray told Ratai that the lives of his brothers would be restored if he offered his son in sacrifice. Ratai did as he was told and the deity was propitiated, who restored Ratai's six brothers and his son to life. The rest of the story followed very closely the story of Chandimangal in adherence to the norms of the later mangal kavyas.

It is difficult to know who wrote the first Raymangal. Krishnaram Das, a later poet of Raymangal, mentions the name of Madhavacharya as the earliest poet who wrote Raymangal. But no one else mentions him as such, and no work in his name has yet been discovered. He, however, did write mangal kavyas on other subjects. But there is some information about Krishnaram Das himself, who gives a short history of the origin of his poem. He tells us that he was once sleeping in a village named Barishya, when he dreamed of Dakshin Ray. The deity commanded him to write a poem about his glorious deeds in a mangal-kavya. Krishnaram was hesitant at first; but later agreed when Dakshin Ray assured him that his tigers would kill anyone who would dislike the poem.

Krishnaram mentions the year in which he composed his poem as 1686. Besides Raymangal, Krishnaram also wrote other mangal kavyas, such as Kalikamangal, which testify to his scholarship in classical Sanskrit literature, and to his skill in rendering well-known Sanskrit verses into Bengali.

Rudradev is another poet who is known for his Raymangal. His work came later than that of Krishnaram's. In Rudradev's work there are three episodes, one of which concerns the terrible fight between Dakshin Ray and Bada Ghazi Khan, a Muslim Pir, who vied with each other for territorial supremacy over the Sundarvans. Another episode is about the voyage of a merchant, Pushpadatta, who is drawn in imitation of the merchant character in Chandimangal. Rudradev's work has, however, no literary quality.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Asit Kumar Bandyopadhyaya, Bangla sahityer itivritta Vol. III (Calcutta, 1966); Asutosh Bhattacharyya, Bangla mangal kavyer itihas, 6th ed. (Calcutta, 1975).

As.B.

RAYSHEKHAR (Bengali; 16th c.) was a post-Chaitanya composer of Vaishnava lyrics in medieval Bengali. His identification is controversial, for at least two, if not more, poets are known to have composed the lyrics in the name of Shekhar, though there are minor variations in their names. In Padakalpataru, an anthology of Vaishnava padavali collected in the mid-eighteenth century by Vaishnava Das, there are as many as one hundred and seventy-nine lyrics under the bhanitas 'Shekhar', 'Rayshekhar', 'Shekhar Ray', 'Kavi-shekhar', 'Shekhar Kavi', 'Shekhar-Das' and 'Nripa Kavishekhar'. In the Ray Shekharer Padavali, published by Calcutta University, two hundred and fifty-three lyrics have been collected in which three more names as 'Dukhiya Shekhar Ray', 'Papiya Shekhar' and 'Nava Kavishekhar' have been mentioned. Among them one lived in the later part of the sixteenth century and composed lyrics of excellent quality. Another was a poet of the closing era of the sixteenth century. His real name was Devakinandan Simha, but 'Kavishekhar' was his pen-name. He composed the 'panchali kavya' entitled Gopal-vijaya. The third poet composed his lyrics in the mid-seventeeth century. It is possible that some lyrics of Ray Shekhar got mixed with those of Vidyapati, the famous Maithili poet of the fourteenth-fifteenth centuries, whose poetic epithet was also 'Kavishekhar'.

According to some scholars, Rayshekhar was born in the village Padan in the Burdwan district of West Bengal. It is likely that he wrote later than Govindadas Kaviraj (c.1534-1613), another famous Vaishnava lyricist. Rayshekhar was probably a Brahmin by caste. He was a disciple of Raghunandan, the nephew of Narahari Sarkar Thakur of Shrikhanda, a famous Vaishnava centre in the district of Burdwan. Rayshekhar composed four types of lyrics: Brajabuli padas after Govindadas Kaviraj, narratives written in simple Bengali, light lyrics in 'dhamali' metre after Lochan Das and, lastly, the 'dandatmika padas' depicting the 'astakaliya nityalila' of Radha and

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Krishna. Among his best lyrics, mention may be made of the following: 'Kajara ruchihara bayani vishala', 'Gagane aba ghana meha daruna', 'Aota Chidamchandra', 'Sakhi kamane dekhaba mukh', 'Chhanda dhari bandha kari' and 'Sakale asiha Gopal dhenugan laiya'.

BIBLIOGRPHY: Asit Kumar Bandyopadhyaya, Bangla sahityer itivritta Vol. III (Calcutta, 1966); Jatindra Mohan Bhattacharjee and Dwaresh Chandra Sharmacharya (ed.), Rayshekharer padavali (Calcutta, 1955); Satish Chandra Ray (ed.), Padakalpataru of Vaishnava Das, (Vols. I-V, Calcutta, 1915-1931); Sukumar Sen, A History of Brajabuli Literature, (Cacutta, 1935); Bangla Sahityer Itihas (Vol. I, Part II, 2nd ed. Calcutta, 1965).

K.G.

RAZDAN, KRISHNA (Kashmiri; b. 1850, d. 1926), a prominent 'Shiva bhakta' poet of Kashmiri, was born in a cultured family of Kashmiri pandits. He was a Sanskrit scholar of repute and had a good command of Persian as well. His poetry reveals his deep study of the shastras and the puranas. He had studied Persian classics also.

Though a Shaivite by faith, he composed songs in praise of other 'devas', believing that Shiva was the tree of life, the other devas being the branches of the same tree.

Razdan was a great 'Yogi' and devotee of his time. People from various places used to come for his 'darshan' and to seek his blessings. Maharaja Pratap Singh used to come twice a year, in spring and autumn, for his darshan. Razdan was not in favour of renunciation of the world for the attainment of spiritual exaltation. In his spiritual quest he was initiated in 'Shiva yoga' by Mukundram, a noble soul and saint of his times. But the Shiva yoga of Razdan is, in fact, the Shiva yoga of 'Sagun vada,' which is slightly different from the monistic Shaivism of Kashmir. It is said that he was the disciple of Paramanand, but there seems to be no internal or external evidence to substantiate this statement. As a matter of fact, Paramanand and Krishna Razdan are poles apart inasmuch as Paramanand is a perfect Krishna bhakta, while Razdan is a Shiva bhakta. Razdan had a deep interest in music and used to play the Sitar on particular occasions. His love of music is reflected in his poetry which is saturated with melody.

A large part of his compositions in Kashmiri and Persian is yet to be published. His first verse collection, Shiva parinayah, was published by the Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal during 1914-1924 in six different volumes in Devanagari script. Harihar kalyan is the only anthology of his poems published in Persio-Arabic script in 1930 posthumously. Krishna Razdan was basically a singer of melodies. To quote the difinition of Coleridge, his poetry is 'the best words in the best order'. In popularity he is second to none and excels even Paramananda. He imitated none, but many of those who followed him are all his imitators. The compositions of Krishna Razden deserve a special place in Kashmiri literature; especially his description of nature, local colour and musical quality deserve particular mention. His melodies have a soothing effect and are very refreshing.

In handling the language, he is a master. He makes full use of the mythological symbols in his compositions which add grace and meaning to his poetry. It is because of his poetry that a number of mythological symbols and terms have gained popularity among the common people of the valley.

Some of his songs have now become part of Kashmiri folk literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : A.A. Azad, Kashmiri zaban aur shairi, Vol. II (1962); G.M.D. 'Sufi', Kashir (1950); J.L. Kaul, Studies in Kashmiri (1968); Naji Munawar Shouq, Kashri adbuk tarikh (1978); S.K. Raina, Kashmiri bhasha aur sahitya ka itihas (1968); Sunitikumar Chatterji, Cultural Heritage of India (1978).

Mo. S.

REALISM (Bengali). The modern concept of realism in Bengali literature has come from Europe, though some of its ingredients may be discerned in early writings produced in Bengal. These early works reveal to some extent aspects of contemporary life—customs, beliefs, superstitions, social events, etc., but at best they give only a fragmented view of the reality. It is, however, with the beginning of the Renaissance that Bengali life and literature undergoes a change. During this period many literary works were produced which reflected the social pre-occupation of the age. The notable among them are Kalikata kamalalaya, Naba babu bilas, Alaler gharer dulal, Hutam pyanchar naksha, two plays Kulinkulsarbasva and Nildarpan, the poetry of Iswarchandra Gupta, social novels of Bankimchandra Chatterji, two social novels of Rameshchandra Dutt, and Taraknath Ganguly's Svarnalata. This literature was not, however, truly endowed with the essential components of realism but they do foreshadow the pre-requisites of realism in Bengali literature.

With Rabindranath Tagore towards the end of the nineteenth century Bengali literature approached reality through the vista of intellectual realism. His effort was to grasp the dialectic dynamism of reality leaving aside its cruder manifestation. Tagore had a deep awareness of the need for comprehensive depiction of the objects he wrote about and this awareness, perhaps involuntarily, made him the pioneer realist in Bengali literature. Actually, his writings provoked critics like Bipinchandra Pal, Radhakamal Mukherji and others to initiate literary polemics over the true form and content of realistic literature. Of course, whether their perception of Tagore's approach was tenable or not was quite a different matter. The fact remains that though branded a romantic, it was Tagore who broke away from his own world of romanticism.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It is worth mentioning that the earlier Bengali literature is more or less devoid of the basic contents of realism in spite of its marginal presence in literature until the twentieth century. In 1923 Bengali literature ushered in the era of Kallol, a literary movement initiated by a group of young writers. There has been a concerted effort to brand this group as the pioneer realist group in Bengali literature. In fact, the eagerness of the Kallolites to respond to the demand of the age was not matched by their preparedness to perform the self-imposed responsibility. The matter-of-fact way of their depiction succeeded only to create an illusion of reality that fell far short of their avowed claim and objective. The Kallolites were unaware that the essential characteristics of realism had nothing to do with crudity of depictions, rather such depictions were prone to mar the intended effect. They also overlooked that realism did not mean cataloguing of objects but a heightened perception of the totality of objects.

Amongst the post-Tagorians, however, it was the famous Bandyopadhyaya trio (Tarashankar, Bibhutibhusan and Manik) who successfully took the cue from Tagore to revitalise realism with their refreshing blending of life and pattern. In Tarashankar's Ganadevata, Panchagram or Hansuli banker upakatha, Bibhutibhusan's works and Manik's Padmanadir majhi and Putul nacher itikatha the reader finds that experiences attained through the use of a sensory organ are not sufficient to comprehend the total reality of life or society, as they do not intend to include varieties of experiences. The novels are not confined to the stereotypes of an inelastic perception, but the realist totality manifests itself through a harmonious blending of life and design. It is this design in such Bengali novels as referred to that satisfies the aesthetic feeling of the reader. A successful realist fiction always appeals to our aesthetic sense, because within it illusion and reality submerge into a new entity.

Tarashankar succeeded in creating a realistic effect in spite of his adoption of a form whose proximity to the fairytale or legend is apparent. In his Hansuli banker upakatha, a village awakens from the perpetual slumber in the fashion of fairytale parallels. Bibhutibhushan used in Pather panchali and other works a forceful pattern to create a world of his own where probability and improbability mingled to manifest a transcendental reality. His apparent reluctance to portray reality for the sake of including details of all sorts made the novelist's reality more real than its archetype. Thus, in Pather panchali, Sarvojoya's cruelty towards Indir Thakhrun has all appearances of real life experience. Indir dies as naturally as leaves fall from tree. Equally uninhibited is the author's depiction of the death of Durga. Detachment and objectivity in their truest from had installed the author and his creation at the peak of realistic manifestation. Manik Bandyopadhyaya's prime concern was human psyche and hence, as in Dibaratrir kabya, he relied more on action and reaction of human mind under given circumstances than on a colourful depiction of events. He was completely free from the traditional perception of reality. He did not care to portray details of everyday life or experience since he believed such details were not at all essential for depicting reality. He sought reality within the individual and naturally in his characters, as one sees in Putul nacher itikatha, and thus he could afford to ignore the external world. His characters are ordinary human beings whose search for truth ends in the ultimate realisation that life is neither an epic nor a well-written verse. Manik could not, therefore, spare more than one sentence to describe Sendidi's death: 'As dawn approached, Sendidi died.' He set his eye on the psychological response of Sashi and Gopal following the death of Sendidi, not on death itself.

Critical opinions, however, differ as to the nature of the creative process involved in the realistic fiction of Tarashankar, Bibhutibhusan and Manik. Every age has a rhythm of life and reality of its own and an attempt to create a meaningful fiction is limited by the view of life and reality the age takes. In the literary products particularly referred to one can see reality at work and appreciate the four basic ingredients of realism—the sense of time, understanding of social phenomena, perspective of history and evolution of individualistic traits.

The success of Dhurjatiprasad in his Antahshila may be compared to the contentment of a stream when it reaches the confluence, travelling all the way from its starting point. Dhurjati depicted modern man torn by inner conflicts and intellectual crises. Bimal Mitra, in his novel Chhai, expressed his eager quest for knowing the real world. Jyotirindra Nandy in his Baroghar ek uthan created an edifice where degeneration and death mixed to form a present combination just to expose man's helplessness to face the world around him, and the detachment of the author reached a state of ruthless artistry. Contrary to this, Amiyabhusan Mazumdar depicted a world which was simple but meaningful and comprehensive. In his Garh srikhanda the pangs of an historical period found expression. This pain, suffered by the community, can be perceived even with sense organs. This is realism in its truest manifestation. Bimal Kar in his work dwelt on the problems created by a gap in generations, resulting in alienation. In Dewal and other novels this new phenomenon makes for an added dimension. The alienation is also the strongest motif in Shrishendu Mukhopadhyay's works. The lone man, who first appeared in his Ghunpoka, reappeared again and again in Manavjamin or Durvin in his pursuit to justify his alienated existence.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In spite of Tagore's assertion that the 'poet's own vision of the world is more real than the world of matter and substance' (Kavi tava monobhumi/Ramer janmasthan Ayodhyar cheyey satya jeno), there are valid reasons for collecting materials from real life experiences, as 'greater reality' is not merely an expression but can be dug out with conscious effort from the store-house of the real world around us. Hajar churashir ma and Aranyer adhikar of Mahasweta Devi are pointers to this literary maxim.

In contemporary Bengali literature the quest for reality has virtually become a synonym for the quest for knowing one's own identity. Men today are subjected to stress, strain and suffering of immense magnitude. A man sees his nemesis whenever he looks deep into this turmoil. Sunil Gangopadhyaya termed it as 'unexplainable instability', and Samaresh Basu used the expression 'mental and moral quest to know thyself'. Thus in modern works, as in Lotakambal of Sanjib Chattopadhayaya, past and present have been clashing together to create a disruptive tension. Modern perception of existence stresses more its negative aspects, and this realisation of futility actually compels man to seek refuge in the classical perception of invincible existence.

Ud.D.

REALISM (Dogri). The first two decades of Dogri fiction are dominated by a romantic, idealistic, didactic approach to life and its problems. Realism as a trend enters the scene around 1970 with a shift in accent in the stories of the old writers, Ved Rahi and M.M. Sharma, and the advent of a crop of up-and-coming short story writers like Om Goswami, O.P. Sharma 'Sarathi', Chhatrapal and Bandhu Sharma. This is more marked in the two collections of short stories of Om Goswami, Nehn te pote and Haashiae de notes, while the stories of the other writers in Sukka barud, Tapu da admi and Parohame are not totally free from the shades of romantic sentimentalism. The trend gathers momentum with the powerful stories of Om Goswami in his third collection of short stories, entitled Nhere da samundar; here he ruthlessly focusses his attention on social inequities, injustice, exploitation, political corruption, poverty and unemployment, contrast between profession and practice of people in authority, decaying mores of semi-urban society, erosion of values, and so on. Later, short stories of Ved Rahi in Aale and those published in journals, M.M. Sharma's in Dudh lahu zahar and Nayak, and N.D. Jamwal's in his latest collection also have realistic portrayals of life around and the psychology of the characters, in their own distincive styles. Bandhu Sharma also adheres to similar themes and follows the same technique in his short stories compiled in Kingare, and subsequent three collections of Om Goswami, entitled Sunne di chidi, Nherai ghiri di puli and Pagdandi par suraj. The trend is followed by the short story writers of the eighties, like Manoj, Lalit Magotra, Chaman Arora and Deshbandhu Dogra 'Nutan'.

In Dogri novel, the realistic description of events is depicted by Narsingh Dev Jamwal in his Sahitya Akademi Award winning novel Sanjhi dharti bakhle lok (1976) and Deshbandhu Nutan's three novels which appeared in the eighties, Qaidi, Pyoke bhejo and Jangli lok. Nutan's forte is portrayal of life in rural Duggar and it comes alive in all its pathos and poignancy in his novels as much as in his short stories published in Sainskar te mukvani.

Sh.

REALISM (English). The spread of western education fostered the development of modern Indian languages, and made English freely available to the Indians. With the emergence of a new language of prose, writers, inspired by humanism, portrayed contemporary reality. With prose came the novel. Rajmohan's Wife (1864) by Bankimchandra Chatterjee is the first Indo-English novel. Essentially a melodramatic tale, it reflects certain elements of contemporary life and society. Bankim was a shaping influence on the Indian novel for a hundred years. It is, however, with Lal Behari Day's Govinda Samanta (1874) that we see the ushering in of formal realism in the western sense.

Towards the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth, the sketches of Behramji Malabari, Nagesh Vishwanath Pai, Chakravarti Kshetrapal and T.Ramakrishna Pillai taught the succeeding novelists the technique of providing photographic details as well as creating the scene and the atmosphere in the novels. During the last years of the 19th century, B.R.Rajam Iyer's True Greatness of Vasudev Sastri appeared as an exercise in social realism, a juxtaposition of individualism and Vedantic philosophy, and A.Madhavia's five novels written in the early years of this century demonstrated an acute social awareness. Rajam Iyer and Madhavia anticipated much that now one discovers in the novels of R.K.Narayan, Mulk Raj Anand, K.Nagarajan and Raja Rao. The early years in this century also saw the novels of S.M. Mitra and S.K. Ghosh, presenting realistic documentation of the social and cultural confrontations between the British and the Indians. The historical novels of Romesh Chunder Dutt, Sirdar Jogendra Singh and Kali Krishna Lahiri are a blend of historical facts and details of life in the ages dealt with, as well as certain details of social life contemporaneous with the novelists.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

With the beginning of the Gandhian age the novel gained a new momentum and there were several experiments in the form and technique of fiction. The novels of Mulk Raj Anand bring out social problems and sufferings caused by political manoeuvering. One can feel the author's sensitivity, his awareness of the dehumanising effect of social evils and the necessity for creating a just social order. Raja Rao's novels apart from reproducing the contemporary social scene, offer the reader a sense of a permanent and universal reality. In the novels of R.K.Narayan one discovers a world that maintains its stability, despite the continuing changes, contradictions and consequent imbalance set in motion by unstable human motives and actions as well as social and historical vicissitudes. As Raja Rao has shown, Narayan too is preoccupied with the concept of a permanent and universal reality and it reaches the reader by way of his characters who are small individuals and have to face numerous problems in their world. Narayan's realism appears in his presentation of such constraints and freedom from them, and the human struggle is set against the backdrop of a world largely physical in its details of manners, postures and everyday objects of life. Sudhin Ghosh presents realism in the autobiographical details of his childhood as well as in the portrayal of the metropolitan evils in the background of his novels. In G.V.Desani's All About H. Hatterr, apart from a quest for truth, we find the real mixed with comicality, exaggerations and magnified visages of the objects. In Bhabani Bhattacharya's fiction there are faithful representations of characters and events and the backdrop of life against which the freedom struggle, or the battle against poverty, superstition and other evils is fought. The representation is, however, set invariably in allegory or discussion, but its realism is perhaps what one discovers in history, in details taken from the contemporary and changing events as well as the use of a past historical period for reference.

In the novels of the forties and fifties there is an authentic presentation of the life of the Muslim women as in Iqbalunnisa Husain, Zeenuth Fatehally and Attia Husain and of the women in a high-caste Hindu family in Venu Chitale and Santha Rama Rau. Ruth Prawer Jhabwala faithfully details the Indian life at home and in public with her keen observation, and a sense of the comic and ironic. Nayantara Sahgal has been concerned with women's personal sufferings, domestic and marital problems, politics and society and has narrated her stories with well-defined facts. The same realism appears in Muriel Wasi's school administration, in Nargis Dalal's straightforward narration of love, seduction and extra-marital affairs and in Bharati Mukherjee's portrayal of women's personal problems and the problems of the resettlement of the returning Indians. Veena Paintal, Uma Vasudev, Raji Narasimhan, Rama Mehta, Perin Bhanucha, B.K.Karanjia and Leslie de Noronha have also dealt with the real problems one comes across in society. Realism has also entered the novels dealing with alienation for a subject, as we see it operative in the works of Arun Joshi, and a definite treatment of sex is noticeable in Shasti Brata, Saros Cowasjee, Kamala Das, K.M. Trishanku and Vikram Kapur. Manohar Malgaonkar's novels appear almost historical in his faithful use of events from history and the portrayal makes him look more like a historian who has turned into a novelist. Kamala Markandeya's sense of the real appears in her presentation of social and economic problems, especially in the villages, but it is influenced deeply by the romantic heritage in the Indo-English fiction as well by the idealism of Gandhi. In the novels of Anita Desai one notices the accuracy of particulars drawn from the sophisticated upper middle class life. Her realism is apparent in the subjects and characters she selects and the events discussed by the characters. The events take place more in the individual's personality than in the external evironment, turning the depiction into a kind of psychological realism. With the relevant realistic particulars, the struggle for freedom, the division of India and the events thereafter appear powerfully in Khuswant Singh's ironical and satirical novels. In the technique of reportage adopted by K.A. Abbas and the straightforward narration followed by Chaman Nahal one can see the realistic mode of realism.

Realism in Indo-English poetry appeared as a counter-movement to the Romantic tradition with which Indo-English poetry had first started in the early nineteeth century and continued in practice until late in the twentieth. The realist Indo-English poet does not reproduce the individual as a photographer but qualifies, colours and highlights the form and the shape in which the individual is presented. Realism in its true definition actually first appeared in Indo-English poetry after the Indian independence. The poet became aware of a new order and the problems the society now growing had to face. Independence created for him an environment that encouraged questions about the nature of society, the poet's place as an individual in it, and his response to the environment. Placed in the new milieu, he found encouragement in the Indian independence. It made him aware of a language and an idiom which would be appropriate to expressing his own thoughts and feelings.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Other than the typical constituents of Realism, their poetry is an expression of what is known in philosophy as the universal. Death, life, youth, age are the 'constants' here. In Jayanta Mahapatra's poetry, the description of two alternating rains, the pleasant and the violent, treated together as a form of rites, indicates the reality of a different type, exhibiting a natural fact as well as the essence of a ritual. Time and its progression, and time as the source of suffering are also his concepts of 'reality', as are the fleeting views of a fifteen-year old girl, the colour scarlet suddenly appearing over a tree in summer, the white-washed walls in the yard looking naked in its want of colour and variation, the wasted man in the bed in a hospitial. In Ramanujan the concept of reality and the universal takes the form of memory, whether he sees life through the eyes of a boy in a family or presents a contrast between a dull present and a beautiful past. In K.N. Daruwalla the Indian landscape, with the house on fire and the shimmering, dancing, levitating objects in the coils of death, presents the reality as facts associated with cremation and mourning as well as the progress of the normal life in the fact of cooking on another fire, perhaps a few feet away from the funeral pyre. Arun Kolatkar's boat on the sea, the sail getting unfurled on the mast, and the knees—the only visible objects—are real as facts and can be seen by all. Jussawalla's waiter attends to young girls, ignoring others who appear ugly to him, counting chimneys and wondering at their smoke during a rain in a Derbyshire town and thinking that the light from the street lamps is bending low to the frogs moving in numbers into different directions. His tramp sleeps in the afternoon with wet and open mouth, while the sunlight falls into the back of the mouth and the toothless gums. Here is reality of a different order. When A.K. Mehrotra comments that the woman he is talking about is a snake, wind and leaf, he presents the reality, once again, of another kind—a reality of feeling and experience. Keshav Malik's idea of a heart training the limbs into transcendence, Dilip Chitre's embrace without the arms, S. Santhi's monologue while drinking beer at Bangalore, the details in Gieve Patel's contrast between the grandfather and the grandson, Pritish Nandy's kinship with the past, the confessionals of Kamala Das and Gauri Deshpande, Shiv Kumar's observations upon suffering, death, birth and flux, and Ezekiel's reflections on love, sex or society demonstrate such realism.

Indo-English drama has not produced very many playwrights and what is known as realistic drama is hard to come by. Between the early years in this century and its third decade a number of plays showing a sense of realism, however, did appear. Their realism is noticeable in the subjects selected by the playwrights such as the treatment of widow-marriage and the problems in the marriages between young girls and old men in A.C. Krishnaswamy, the inter-caste marriage in S.M. Michael, the sophisticated, urban and middle class life in V.S. Srinivas Aiyangar, the corrupt priestcraft and exploitation of people in Niranjan Pal, the evils of organised religion and society in V. Narayan, the social customs in A.S.P. Ayyars's discussion plays, the contemporary life in D.M. Borgaonkar, the social problems in Balwant Gargi and the domestic life in Ajoy Chunder Dutt. In the thirties Harindranath Chattopadhyay wrote three playlets which deal with social problems, read as 'manifestos of new realism', showing the conflict between the capitalist industrialist and the poor labour, the world of human subjection and man's need for freedom from all bondages. In the forties Bharati Sarabhai dealt with the traditional womanhood, the social philosophy of Mahatma Gandhi, the complex nature of the sophisticated Indian woman and her private world, Mrinalini Sarabhai with the struggle for independence and the conflicting response to it and R.N. Dubhankar with the contemporary political and social atmosphere. Since independence, Asif Currimbhoy has delineated the problems related to politics, society, the East-West relations, religion and also what may be called psychological realism. Lakhan Deb has selected the last days of Mahatma Gandhi, M.V. Rama Sarma the domestic conflicts, Kaiwara Raja Rao the bureaucratic errors and the problems of laws made by man, Nissim Ezekiel the conflict between dream and reality and between what is counterfeit and genuine, Dina Mehta with communalism that stems from migrations, Shri Devi Singh with the decaying aristocracy, Partap Sharma with the sex and life in the brothels, and Shiv K. Kumar with marital incompatibility. Thus realism that belongs to the inner and outer world of man finds a powerful expression in the Indian writings in English.

Sh.Ba.

REALISM (Gujarati). While realism was a dominant force in European literature, in Gujarati it was still a nascent trend. It gained force with the advent of Gandhi on the Indian scene. A democrat, Gandhi held the view that literature should reflect the life of the people. Those writers who assiduously committed themselves to realism subscribed to the view that life should be faithfully presented in literature. They drew their subjects from life and their characters were drawn from the different strata of society. Moreover, the language spoken by the different classes of people was chosen as a proper medium corresponding to their taste, temperament and sentiments.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

While concentrating our attention on realism in poetry, we cannot but recall Jhaverchand Meghani, who faithfully mirrored the social conditions of his time in his poems. His famous anthology Yugavandana shows the harsh reality of the life of the wretched people, more so the exploited peasants and labourers. Besides, his poems, dealing with patriotic feelings and the Gandhian ideology, established him as a major poet in Gujarati.

Sundaram and Umashankar Joshi, born and brought up in villages, imbibed the spirit of realism in their poetry. Further, the impact of Gandhiji's thoughts made them inclined towards idealism-oriented realism. Sundaram's first anthology Koya bhagatni kadvi vani ane garibinan gito itself is suggestive of his approach to life and literature. He voices the feelings of the common, suffering people and dwells upon incidents related to the lower strata of life. Further, evidence of his realistic approach is revealed in his famous poems such as 'Bhangeli ghadiala', 'Ghan uthava', 'Intala' and 'footpath and talai', in which insignificant and trivial objects are exploited as new images.

Umashankar Joshi, who earned a reputation as the poet of universal peace for his Vishvashanti, also wrote such poems as 'Ek chusayela gotalane', 'Ghaninun git', 'Hathodanun git' in which he dwells on petty, discarded and trivial things so as to create the impression of reality. No doubt, all these objects are evoked by him to arouse patriotic feelings, sympathy towards society and compassion for humanity at large. Characters like a washerman, a cobbler, a dealer in bangles, all are part of Umashankar's poetic world.

Among the rest of the poets who have devoted themselves to realism are Sheshu, Shridharani and Snehrashmi, who combined their realistic attitude with Gandhian ideology.

Gujarati poetry after 1940 gradually turned to aestheticism and yet the impact of realism is perceptible. The poets who deserve a mention in this group are Rajendra Shah and Niranjan Bhagat. Rajendra Shah frequently uses language and rhythm appropriate to rustic people, while portraying their life. On the contrary, Niranjan Bhagat gives expression to the feeling of frustration resulting from a meaningless pursuit of life in the heart of Bombay in his 'Pravaladvip' which is a separate section of poems found in his famous anthology Chandolaya.

Jhaverchand Meghani arrests our attention in his novel Sorath taran vahetan pani which presents real incidents from both the heroic past and the present Saurashtra.

Tulsi kyaro and Niranjan are his other novels in which the craft of fiction and reality of life are harmoniously blended. Ramanlal Desai, who has profusely contributed to the development of Gujarati novel, has interwoven national fervour under the direct influence of Gandhiji into the theme of his famous novels Divya chakshu and Bharelo agni. Gramlakshmi, Jhanjhavat and Pralaya are his other novels in which art and reality are fused into an organic pattern.

The trend of realism continues further in the novels of Pannalal Patel and Ishwar Petlikar. Pannalal writes about the customs and traditions of the village life from the realistic point of view in his novels Malela jiv and Manavini bhavai. The zeal for social reform is carried out along with the realistic presentation of social life in Janamtip, Lakhya lakh, Tarna othe dungar, Bhavsagar and many other novels written by Petlikar. Besides these novelists, Pitambar Patel, Chunilal Madiya, Jayanti Dalal and Pushkar Chandavarkar also deserve mention for contribution to realistic fiction.

In Gujarati short stories Dhumketu tackles the social problems involving the people of lower classes, depicting their sentiments and sufferings. A large number of his stories included in Tankhamandal deal with poverty, social inequality and disparity prevailing in the life of the village folks. Sundaram, as a short-story writer, deals with the rural and urban society realistically. Excessive realism resorted to in his stories 'Narsinha' and 'Kholaki', some times bordering on vulgarism, exposed Sundaram to criticism. Dviref, too, occasionally touches upon the lower strata of life from the realistic point of view. His 'Khemi' is regarded as the most representative work in the field. Sneharashmi, Meghani, Pannalal and others as well have largely contributed to the Gujarati short-story based on the realistic trend.

Gujarati plays too respond to the realistic trend in literature. Umashankar's collection Sapana bhara is the first evidence of realistic representation of the rural and urban society. Udan charakaladi, Dhedna dhed bhangi and Khetarna khole unfold the customs and superstitious beliefs of the village folk. His most tragic play Sapana bhara deals with a plot largely centred around the life in the country side, employing the rural dialect in dialogues. Jayanti Dalal, too, dramatises vividly the incidents and events directly picked up from contemporary social life, presenting the day-to-day reality in a satirical vein. His one-act plays are also expressive of a large variety of social themes in the same vein. Several realistic plays by Dhansukhlal Mehta, Shivkumar Joshi and Durgesh Shukla also present social life with artistic dramatization.

Ch.Y.

REALISM (Hindi). Though known for its emphasis on high moral values and spirituality, Indian literature does show a realistic approach to life as well. The first major realistic writer in Hindi was Kabir (1398-1518), who vehemently attacked the rituals, hypocrisy and corrupt practices prevalent in the contemporary social and religious life. Though an idealist, Tulsidas too was aware of the ills of society during his age. The 'kali prasang' in the 'Uttarkand' of Ramacharitmanas and a number of verses in Vinay-patrika depict the sad state of affairs, and present a faithful picture of the political, social and religious life of his times. But it was Bharatendu Harishchandra and his associates who brought Hindi literature to the threshold of the modern era. Though several poets still continued to write devotional poems and erotic verses, the spirit of renaissance soon inspired them to discover fresh pastures. They became conscious of the happenings in society and tried to portray a realistic picture of the plight of the common people exposed to social inequity, economic exploitation by an alien power and heavy taxation. In the past, literature belonged primarily to the prosperous few; now it tended to become more and more a concern of the common people reflecting their fears and frustrations, hopes and aspirations.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Thus the Bharatendu era paved the way for the poets of the future to be more realistic and revolutionary in their approach to life and to write literature with a new spirit. Bharatendu's plays Bharat durdasha, Andher nagari and the poems of Pratapnarayan Mishra, Premghana and Bharatendu himself are a few examples of realistic writing during this period.

The scathing realism of the Bharatendu era is conspicuous by its absence in the poetry of the Dwivedi era. The poets during this period, because of their idealism, turned a blind eye to the problems facing society with the result that the tone of realism got subdued.

The 'Chhayavadi' poetry of the romantic poets is escapist in nature. However, the Second World War brought in a new approach and a fresh vision which has been called socialistic realism. Among the chhayavadi poets Nirala is the most realistic poet. His collections of poems Anima, Bela, Naye patte and his outstanding poems 'Kukurmutta', 'Bhikshuk' and 'Vah torti patthar' not only acquaint us with the sordid side of life, but arouse sympathy for the poor, the downtrodden and the oppressed, and call upon the people to challenge oppression and the capitalistic order of society. Sumitranandan Pant too came in touch with the progressive ideology, but his poems Yugant and Gramya give evidence more of his humanitarian ideals than of any revolutionary zeal.

Socialist ideology and realistic art found expression in the works of the progressive poets. The changes that occurred in the political and social life around 1936 affected the Hindi poets; especially, the Marxist ideology influenced their thought and their approach to the problems of life. They faced the facts of life and presented a realistic picture of society, especially the proletariat and the oppressed sections of society.

'Nai kavita' or 'New poetry' was primarily concerned with making experiments in form and technique, but it also gave expression to the disillusionment and frustration of the new generation. The 'new' poets were not distant or detached witnesses of sordid life, but themselves suffered at the hands of the people in power. The contemporary Hindi poetry is realistic not only in its content, but also in its form, structure and language.

When we turn to fiction, it was Premchand who in his novels and short stories depicted the everyday life of the common man and highlighted the problems facing society. In his earlier works, influenced by Gandhi and the Arya Samaj, he laid stress on moral values, social and economic reforms, appealing to the nobler instincts of mankind. In his novels like Sewasadan, Karmabhumi and Premashram, he gave a faithful picture of society, but the solutions to problems suggested by him were based on his faith in the principle of change of heart. Thus he appears more of an idealist than a rebel in the earlier phase. Later, influenced by Gorky perhaps and perturbed by the stark realities of life at home, his voice became more radical. In his Rangabhumi and Godan and in his short stories like 'Pus ki rat' and 'Kafan' he is a realist in the true sense of the word. In these works he presents life and its various aspects as he sees them. Here he does not preach, does not make a quiet appeal, but presents forcefully the sufferings and tribulations of the Indian farmer and labourer. Other poor and exploited sections of society too have been painted by him with deep sympathy and understanding. He was the only writer of his age, who had minutely examined the fibre of society and portrayed it in the true colour. The result is that we witness for the first time a vivid and true portrayal of the vast populace hitherto ignored.

Jaishankar Prasad another great writer and primarily a chhayavadi poet and dramatist, turned, to stark realism in his novels Kankal and Titali. Again, Vrindavanlal Varma, known for his historical realism, touched on the social problems too, occasionally. Nirala seems more progressive in his writings. Jainendra, Ilachandra Joshi and Agyeya, influenced by the western psychological theories, probed deep into the human psyche; they have been sometimes called novelists of psychological realism.

Realism is an integral part of progressive literature. The Marxist novelists, Yashpal, Rangeya Raghav and Nagarjun, carried the tradition of Premchand forward and portrayed society, both rural and urban, on a larger canvas. Other notable novelists of this stream are Phanishvar Nath 'Renu', Rajendra Yadav, Kamleshwar, Mohan Rakesh, Rahi Masum Raza, Srilal Shukla, Amar Kaul, Shekhar Joshi, Bhisham Sahni, Mridula Garg, Usha Priyamvada, Mannu Bhandari and Giriraj Kishore. In their novels and short stories, we find the Indian masses, especially the middle and lower classes struggling for their existence and identity. They have paid special attention to the middle class woman, her problems both at home and outside, and her struggle for survival in her valiant fight against the harsh feudal values and man's egotism. Thus the farmers, the labourers, the untouchables, the middle class educated and employed women—in short, all the weaker and expolited sections of society have been portrayed with all their weaknesses and struggle and suffering. The most touching scenes are those which are connected with class-conflict and exploitation of the poor at the hands of the rich.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In the field of drama, it was Bharatendu again who had successfully attempted to popularise plays among the common people. His plays may not be of high literary value, but because of their themes, language and stageability they attracted the audience and provided healthy entertainment. His dramas Bharat durdasha, and Andher nagari paint the sad plight of the people due both to foreign rule and our own social and religious ills. Prasad in his historical plays and Uday Shankar Bhatt in his mythological plays indirectly touched upon problems, both political and social, and gave voice to the hopes and aspirations of the people. Hari Krishna 'Premi' and Laxmi Narayan Misra, influenced by Ibsen's plays, adopted his technique, and were bold enough to expose the ills of society, especially the problems faced by women. However, it was after 1936 that realism, in a true sense, dominated Hindi drama. The prominent dramatists of this realistic trend in drama are 'Ashka', Vishnu Prabhakar, Bhagwati Charan Verma, and Laxmi Narayan Lal.

Hari Shankar Parsai and Sharad Joshi have, with their pungent satire, underlined the hypocrisy, sham and deceit corroding our social and political life. The sketches (Rekhachitra), the memoirs (Sansmarana), the reportage penned by Mahadevi Verma, Prakash Chandra Gupta, Ram Briksha Benipuri and Rangeya Raghav also display their concern for the ills of society, and point out the inconsistencies and incongruities in our life.

Hindi essay is still dominated by intellectual analysis and literary graces which leave little scope for realistic portrayal. However, some of the essayists like Acharya Shukla, Hazariprasad Dwivedi, Nand Dulare Bajpai, Nagendra, Ram Vilas Sharma, Vidya Niwas Misra have discussed the problems of art and literature on a broader and universal plane and there is a streak of humanism in their exposition. To all of them, man is the centre of creative art and his welfare should be the main concern of all intellectuals, thinkers, philosophers and writers.

Thus, today, realism, in all its aspects and forms, has become the dominant note in modern Hindi literature.

S.S.G.
Gov.R.

REALISM (Kannada) as a literary theory is of recent origin, even in the West. The discussion of realism barely spans half a century in Kannada, while creative literature spans more than ten centuries. Early Kannada literature was linked to religion in several ways, and in the first extant creative work, Vaddaradhane (c. AD 920), it is a handmaid to religion. Yet there are realistic touches in these works. Even in Vaddaradhane the account of a love-infected prince and the description of two young princes, illiterate and ignorant, when they stand before the king, are delightfully realistic. There is psychological realism in the depiction of characters in the classical works, despite kinship with religion and their intention of presenting ideal men and women, an intention which leads to the creation of characters larger than life. From the point of view of realism the most remarkable work of the pre-modern period is Janna's Yashodhara charite (1209); the depiction of Amritamathi, the lovely wife of a handsome and virtuous prince, when she is caught in the coils of an abnormal sexual passion, is striking.

Vachana literature needs to be mentioned separately. The vachanas were not deliberately composed as literature but were the utterances of persons—some of them illiterate—intensely religious and at times passionately advocating social reforms, which became literature. They lay bare at times the agonies and the joys of utterly sincere devotees. In them are to be found both realism of presentaion and realism of content, as well as psychological realism. Similarly, the compositions of the Dasas (the servants of God) are passionate utterances of sincere devotees and critics of society.

One can speak of realism only with reference to Navodaya and later literature. In earlier literature, it is to be glimpsed occasionally. But with Navodaya literature a conscious desire to be realistic emerges. There is a curious mixture of realism in much of Navodaya writing. This is conspicuous in the poetry of the two major poets of the era, Bendre and Puttappa. D.V. Gundappa's Mankuthimmana kagga makes a brave attempt to see life as it is, to recognize the realities of life and come to terms with it. Its realism is characterized by a recognition of the many-facetedness of all phenomena and experience, and sober approach to life. G.P Rajaratnam's Yendkudka Ratnana padagalu seeks to look at life from the point of view of a man addicted to drinking, and employs rustic dialect; but the sophisticated mind reveals itself time and again.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The central tradition of the Kannada novel is realistic. There are critics who have asserted that there is really no 'tradition' of the Kannada novel since the only two significant novelists who wrote realistically were Shivarama Karanth and K.V. Puttappa. It is true that these are the towering figures, but until the early fifties novelists (like Devudu Narasimha Sastry) who did not seek to portray life as they saw it around them were few indeed. Gulvadi Venkata Rao's Indira (1899) and Bolara Babu Rao's Vagdevi (1905) ushered in realism in the novel. The former depicts the sorrowful life of a widow in an orthodox family and the latter exposes hypocrisy in religious centres. The most important of the novels before Karanth that appeared on the scene was Madiddunno Maharaya (1915) by M. S. Puttanna. The novel is didactic and introduces magic and an element of the supernatural. There is an idealistic strain in the novel. But it catches both the structure and the cross currents of rural life and is realistic in its depiction of most of the characters, particularly of those not at the centre. Karanth's Chomana dudi (1932) presents, with restraint but without glossing over the harsh realities, contemporary society with an untouchable at the centre, and registers the colonial experience. Both Karanth and 'Kuvempu' (K.V. Puttappa) have shaped the realistic tradition in the Kannada novel. They are concerned with the individual as well as the society that shapes his life in many ways.

Critical realism shapes these novels. Kuvempu's second novel, Malegalalli madumagalu (1967), is a more remarkable work than his Kanuru heggadithi (1936) because in the former a whole community is the 'hero', and the tendency to portray larger-than-life characters is held in check. Karanth sometimes changed his technique (as in Alida mele and Mukajjiya kanasugalu) but he has been the architect of the realistic tradition; moral criteria evolve as he portrays without sentimentality the men and society around him. Novels like Rao Bahadur's Gramayana belong to this central tradition. Adya Rangacharya ('Sriranga') stands out for his psychological and critical realism. His 'Anadi' and 'Prakriti' represent the two approaches. In drama the major figures of this era were T.P. Kailasam and 'Sriranga'. Kailasam's plays were avowedly realistic; his characters were not, as in the mythological and historical plays of the professional troupes, mythological heroes or supermen; they were ordinary men and women and, sometimes, mere boys; he was the first playwright to put a widow on the stage. The events which made up the plot were from the work-a-day world. There was serious purpose behind the rich humour; it was a didactic purpose. But what was lacking in was depth. And the peculiar 'Kannadanglo' he evolved seriously limited his appeal and his influence. 'Sriranga' was a growing dramatist, unwearingly experimenting. Beginning with realistic plays which examined the contemporary society critically, he went on to write plays in which he sought to go straight to the heart of the matter—and, in the process, sometimes became too intellectual and critical. His realism was not limited to fidelity to contemporary manners and ways; he sought to probe the deepest causes of change as well as deterioration. Not only contemporary India but the contemporary world challenged him. The intellect dominates. Neither Kailasam nor Sriranga founded a school or inaugurated a tradition. Masti's realism lies in the unravelling of the potentiality of human nature both for good and for evil; and this he pursues even when he uses mythological material or the supernatural element. Some of those like 'Ananda' (A. Seetharam) or K. Gopalakrishna Rao who wrote in Masti's tradition were really Romantics at heart. Nearer Masti's realism is Gorur Ramaswamy Iyengar.

The Pragatisheela Age was influenced by the realism of French writers like Flaubert and Maupassant and the social realism of Marxist writings. But what most of those writing achieved was realism of detail and a presentation. Some of these writers like A.N. Krishna Rao and T.R. Subba Rao were, in fact, Romantics who made realism their creed because of historical necessity. Genuine social realism shapes a few stories and novels of Niranjana.

Navya literature deliberately rejected the realism of the Pragatisheela Age. It used fantasy and dream experience in ample measure. Reacting against the earlier conception of character as stable and consistent, it achieved psychological realism in the sense that it more faithfully captures the tensions and flow of cross currents and contradictions inherent in human nature. Both in the novel and in the short story Navya achievement was high, while outwardly it seemed far removed from daily life. Novels like Samskara and Mooru darigalu and stories like 'Prakriti' and 'Nivritharu' capture the realities of the inner world and the interaction among men and women better than many writings with profusion of realistic details. To the fiction writer seeking to recreate the interior landscape the stream of consciousness technique and the monologue proved immensely useful.

The last decade has seen the rise of the Bandaya and Dalita school. There has been a return to the realism of the Pragtisheela days but without the lurking Romanticism and with a stronger commitment to Marxism. There is, therefore, more evident social realism. There is a more liberal use of dialects, particularly of rural dialects. This is literature which seeks to use the pen as an instrument of social revolution. It is interesting that the writing is growing more realistic in the sense that it recognizes exploitation in different guises and from different sources and not only the exploitation of the labour class by the capitalists; in other words, it is going beyond text-book exposition of class struggle. Another interesting development is the attention man-in-society has received from writers like Yashwant Chittal and Lankesh, who were earlier absorbed in the study of man in loneliness. Chittal's stories and Lankesh's Mussanjeya kathaprasanga are instances in point.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

There are important names and works outside the schools mentioned above which need to be considered. By and large, the novel and the short story have been engaged in the delineation of society in a spirit of liberalism and humanism. A host of writers from H.L. Nage Gowda to Vyasaraya Ballala and Mirji Anna Rao have followed this path. In the last three decades women writers have come to the fore; and this has been their path too (with a few exceptions which include Rajalakshmi N. Rao and Veena Elburgi). M.K. Indira, Anupama Niranjana and Geetha Kulkarni, for example, have given us realistic novels in this sense. One of the most remarkable achievements of the realistic novel in Kannada, if not the most remarkable achievement, is S.L. Bhyrappa's Griha bhanga. It seems to be no more than a faithful recording of the happenings and the very words and actions of certain men and women in a narrow belt in the Old Mysore State. But the novel goes deep into the nature of the power of survival. It is realistic in the deeper sense that it portrays the will to survive clashing with the forces of destruction.

L.S.S.R.

REALISM (Konkani). The year 1946 was a turning point in Konkani literature. The liberation movement brought a new vigour into literature. The writer's contacts with the reality of life became more alive. All the works bear one meaningful similarity—they show an interest in social issues and turn away from the aesthetic principles of art. This shift in emphasis begins at once to reveal a characteristic tendency, i.e. social awareness, in the literature of this period.

B.B. Borkar's (1910-1984) Painjana (1960) expresses faith in Goans to break their chains and forge their own destiny. R.V. Pandit's (1917-1990) five collections of poems published after 1960 bring a new strength to poetry with the colloquial idiom of the folks in Goa, M.L. Sardessai's Zaiat zage (1964) depicts discontent at the existence of remnants of slavery and ignorance even after liberation. B.B. Borkar, M.L. Sardessai and R.V. Pandit paid the foundation for social realism in poetry, setting aside erstwhile predominant aesthetic values. In fact, there has been a tradition in Konkani literature of realistic and analytical writing, but now onwards it became the main trend.

P.N. Nayak's Ga Ami Rakhane (1976) introduces a new vioce in Konkani poetry. The poems of the volume arouse hopes in the minds of readers by the poet's extraordinary strength and potentiality for revolution. His empathetic description of the afflictions and agonies of the downtrodden is an authentic record both in idiom and in content. A feeling of despair is another remarkable feature of this period. 'Vascoyan' (1977), a poem by Prakash Padgaonkar, presents a heart-rending description of the growing city of Vasco. The theme of revolt against tradition appears again in the poems of Nagesh Karmali. Social content is the significant feature of his poetry. It is a poetry of revolt and struggle for social order, Moreover, there is greater political awareness in his poetry. These themes are obvious in his Zorgot (1979) and Sanvar (1979).

Ramesh Velluskar has enriched Konkani poetry by presenting the realistic descriptions of rural life. The woes of the labourers and the suppressed are reflected in his collection Matee (1983). C.F. D'Costa and Olivinho Gomes are other significant poets known for the realistic portrayal of the social world. D'Costa's Soncyachekan and Olivinho Gomes' Punjailyo Paklleo display righteous indignation at injustice and expose the hypocrisy of men. Tomazinho Cardozo, J.B. Moraes and Vijaybai Sarmalkar write on similiar themes, but Cardozo writes in a satirical mode to expose the duplicity in politics. Even at the beginning of the decade of the 80s we find poetry dealing with social issues. The veteran poet B.B. Borkar's Sasay shows despair at the state of things after the 70s in Goa. In spite of political freedom the poet finds that the people are in chains of economic inequality, ignorance and illiteracy. M.L. Sardessai's Pissolim expresses restrained anger at social injustice.

Social issues of the day, and concern for children and women are reflected in the poetry of Ramakant Zuarkar, Prabhakar Tendulkar and Vatsala Manjunath Rao.

Fiction in the realistic vein in Konkani literature has come into prominence only in the 70s. P.N. Nayak's Achcheve (1977), set in regional atmosphere, mirrors the distinct changes in the Goan peasantry during the last 25 years following the exploration of iron and manganese mines. The regional character of the novel is obvious from its theme, plot and character. Primarily a writer of rural life, Nayak in his second novel Bambar (1977) depicts the distinctive features and primary urges of the unlettered masses, and his characters speak in rustic dialect with a heavy folkloric accent.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Ravindra Kelekar's Tulasi written in the realistic mode reflects the Goan tradition of thought and sensibility. Again, Tukaram Sheth's Pankhlo (1977) is a fine blending of romance and realism, and sets a trend in reconciling the claims of individual consciousness and social awareness. Karmelin (1982) by Damodar Mauzo has been hailed by critics as an example of moral realism. It depicts the life of Goans in the Gulf countries. Lancy Pinto Naik from Mangalore has also depicted life in the Gulf countries in her novels. Leo D'Souza, J.S. Silva and Stan Agere too describe domestic issues and plead for social justice.

The Konkani drama mirrors the social issues realistically. Here, too, P.N. Nayak is at the forefront. His one-act plays Raktakhev (1978), Rakhon (1980) and Chowrangi (1982) are noteworthy contributions to Konkani literature. Alienation, conflict between the old and the new, problems of communication and strained human relations are some of the major themes in his plays. N. Shivdas presents psychologically the oddities of human nature in his play Pisantt (1979). Dilip Borkar, Ashok Kamat and Ram Krishna Zuwarkar have also unfolded the social problems of the day-to-day life. C.F. D'Costa's plays expose sham and hypocrisy, Prakash Thali's one act-plays and Tomazinho Cardozo's plays deal with the lives of ordinary people. Both are critical in their approach and write in a satirical vein. J.L. Gomes deals with middle-class family life. Social and political disenchantment appears to be the major basis of Konkani drama.

The short-story writers in Konkani literature have penetrated the secret recesses of the human mind. They write not only about the elementary struggle for life, but carry forward the quest for an understanding of our lives as social creatures and as individual human beings. The only significant writer before the liberation was Shanni Goembab whose short stories presented a slice of life, but is was only after the liberation that realism crept in the form of short story. One of the most significant writers of the short story is Chandrakant Keni. His collections of stories, Dhortari Azun Jietali (1964), Ashad Panvali (1973), and his Sahitya Akademi Award winner Vhonkal Pavani emphasise human relations and human warmth. In most of his stories Keni recreates with great sympathy the socio-cultural life of the Goans after the liberation, Keni does not look back in anger or forward in fear, but around in awarness.

P. N. Nayak has widened the range of Konkani short story. His Har, Pishantar and Muthai reveal fundamental seriousness in his works. His writing many a time is in a pessimistic tone. He is a regionalist but transforms his local backyard into an image of the whole creative universe. Damodar Mauzo (Ganthan and Jagrana) and N. Shivdas (Galsari) display fine blending of romanticism and realism. Both have a sharp eye for the absurdities of life, especially Shivadas who focusses on obscenities of living. Another significant writer is A.N. Mhambro, whose Panaji atam Mhatari Zalea mirrors reality in a satirical vein.

Social consciousness pervades the stories of Olivinho Gomes. His Man Oddata Voddana depicts the life of ordinary people. The writer's emphasis is on the truth of feeling and behaviour rather than on the truth of ideas. Francis Saldanha and J.S. Alvares also deal with social issues. There are a few other short-story writers also who deal with emotional upheavals and sexual repression and frustration.

Many women writers have achieved distinction in the field of short story. Shiela Naik's Oli Sanj displays her empathy for fellow human beings and natural affections of childhood. One of the major writers of the short story is Meena Kakodkar. Her Dongar Chauvalla presents ironical portrayals based on realism. Very often she writes about the threatening pressures of modern living. Jayamala Danayat deals with homely joys and social issues concerning women. Jayanti Naik, a young woman writer, depicts rural life in the manner of P.N. Nayak. The women writers do not reflect the major upheavals in society, but they do bring to literature a distinct feminine insight.

Thus Konkani literature is strongly rooted in an identifiable locale and is largely realistic in its mode of expression.

F.F.

REALISM (Maithili) is ordinarily taken to be a modern phenomenon, but as early as in Jyotirishvara (*c.*1324) we find an acute sense of the facts of life, not only in his prose work when he describes a city, but also in his dramatic work Dhurttasamagama (Assembly of knaves) which required the introduction of the seamy side of life. Even Vidyapati (*c.*1360-1448) gave realistic details in his prose romance Kirttilata as well as in Nacharis. Moreover, even while expressing personal feelings of love or devotion, or describing such a shocking event in public life as the famine of 1873 (Kavitta akali by Fatur Kavi), the Maithili writers were realistic.

Realism as a literary movement or trend, however, was unknown in the past: literary endeavour then used to be either a sacred activity or a source of entertainment.

Realism appeared as a literary trend when in the twentieth century writers made contemporary life their subject-matter. Chanda Jha (1831-1907), Jivana Jha

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

(1848-1912), Bhuvaneshvar Singh 'Bhuvan' (1907-1944), and Janardan Jha 'Janasidan' (1872-1951) in poetry, drama and fiction made realism a necessary element. Nevertheless, they did not make realism a literary movement. As yet, there was no conscious effort to emphasize the realities of life, howsoever gloomy or unpleasant, to arouse the conscience of the people and bring about a change in society.

This movement actually began with the publication of Vaidyanatha Mishra Yatri's volume of poems, called Chitra (1949). In a famous poem entitled 'Kavi ka swapna' (Poet's dream), the poet declared that the modern poet should see the realities and give due importance to the lower classes and ordinary things in life. In another poem 'Param satya' (Greatest truth) he enunciated that what matters in life is the materialistic truth, not the so-called Vedantic truth. Yatri also made his diction, imagery and rhythm reflect realism, and banished idealization, exaggeration, melodrama, etc. in the new literature that he wrote. Indeed, in an earlier work, the novel Paro (1946), he did not even fight shy of insinuating an incestuous love between close cousins and giving lurid details of the heroine's life. He kept on the realistic approach to life even in the diction and style of this work.

Others followed Yatri's example. Rajakamal Choudhary (1929-67) announced that the changed generation was writing poetry not for entertainment or embellishment or even as devotion. In the preface to his volume of poems, Svaragandha (1958) he boldly wrote of the inner realism that spoke more articulately than actual words of man and his predicament on this earth. Even in prose fiction Rajkamal did not mince words. In his short stories in general and in his novel Adikatha (1958) in particular he was fearlessly vocal; indeed, like Yatri's Paro, his novel also invited the opposition of the traditionalists.

Even traditionalists like Kanchinath Jha 'Kirana' (1906-89) turned radical. 'Kirana' was a radical in his language and diction too. In his short stories as well as one-act plays like Karna, he upheld uneasy and harsh reality, rather than tender idealization.

Ramkrishna Jha 'Kisun' (1923-1970) was an outspoken advocate of the new voice in poetry as well as prose. Other writers who advocated realism were Lily Ray (b.1933) in her fiction, Lalit (1932-83) in his short stories, Mayanand Mishra (b.1934) in his later poems, Somadeva (b.1934) in Kaladhvani (Accent of Time, 1965), Ramanand 'Renu' (b.1934) and Dhivendia (b.1934) in novels like Bhorukaba (Early dawn, 1965) and Kado a koila (Mud and the coal, 1980), Sudhanshushekhar Choudhary (1923-1990) in his one-act plays, and Mahendra Malangiya in his plays on rural life. Several other young poets like Kirtinarayana Mishra (b.1937), Virendra Malik and Gangeshi 'Gujan' (b.1940) produced realistic literature in its varied forms, exploiting Freud's psychology, Sartre's existentialism and Proust's stream of consciousness in one form or the other.

Though traditionalists have not stopped writing in their individual styles, yet even they too have been influenced by the new trend. Realism has, indeed, come to stay in modern Maithili literature as one of its most potent trends.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gopal Jha and Basuki Nath Jha (ed.), Yatharthavada o adhunika sahitya (Patna, 1985); Harimohan Mishra, Adhunika Maithili kavita (1980).

J.M.

REALISM (Malayalam) as a mode of writing underscores the importance of man in relation to his environment. It seeks to project the vibrant realities of life through a direct, concrete and down-to-earth language. Realism emphasises the here and now, preferring the ordinary to the exceptional and the sensational.

Realism as a literary tradition may be understood as a historical trend rather than as merely relating to the content or form of a work. In Malayalam, the trend of realistic writing dates back to the ancient period, when the school of 'pattu' literature existed side by side with the ornate, classical Sanskrit literary tradition. Written in a simple, localised and lucid style, pattu poetry in its multifarious forms like ballads, narrative songs, work songs and reminiscences embodied the ideas and aspirations of a whole race. The trend of realism set by this corpus of literature extends down to the works of Ezhuttacchan, Puntanam and Cherusseri which, even while discussing philosophical, spiritual and mythical matters, are infused with a rare grasp of the complexities of life.

During the medieval phase, Kunchan Nambiar, the harbinger of 'tullal' poetry, emerges as a poet of great mass appeal. Adapting stories from the puranas to suit his purpose of creating a popular dance-drama (also called 'tullal'), he makes his motive clear: To entertain a huge army consisting of common soldiers, the mellifluous, simple Malayalam is the most appropriate. If a poet enters a thick jungle of hard, complex Sanskrit words, the soldiers will get up and leave the hall.' A humorist par excellence, his device for narration of the epic story is to give it a local habitation and a name, making it completely realistic and familiar to his contemporaries. For example, whether it is Hastinapuri, Dwaraka or Vidarbha, there are people from all castes of Kerala—like Nambudiris,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Pattars and Nayars who hover around, and everything is described as it happened in Trivandrum or Ambalappuzha, his native town. In his tullal poems, apart from evoking humour, Nambiar also achieved the purpose of presenting a realistic picture of his contemporary society and directing his satire on the evils of that society

It was during the early part of the twentieth century that realism as an off-shoot of the western concept took root in Malayalam. After an exposure to western literature, prose became a popular medium of writing. Information, and not creation, became the purpose of writing, and it made literature more accessible to the masses. Prose itself branched off to several genres like the novel, the short-story, essay, travelogue, etc.

In the field of fiction, the development of realism is directly linked to the nineteenth century European novelists like Balzac, Stendhal, Zola and Flaubert. According to western terminology, realism is a major political, philosophical and practical issue which acknowledges a historical act of production, shattering old forms in the interest of a new and effective hold on reality. In Malayalam, Kesari Balakrishna Pillai, the veteran journalist, was the earliest stalwart who came under the powerful impact of European realism—French, German, Swedish and Russian. His paper Swadeshabhimani serialised novels having a contemporary significance.

By the third decade of the twentieth century, the novel became an established medium to portray realistically the sections, groups and individuals with a representative character, motivated by the ideal of social reconstruction. This brand of social realism may be seen as a powerful force in the works of all the major novelists of the day—like Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai, Kesava Dev and Basheer. Inspired by Marxian ideology, these writers highlighted the want and privation in the lives of the underprivileged sections of society. In order to suit the subject-matter, the language also became simple, straightforward and realistic. Thakazhi, starting as an admirer of the works of Maupassant, wrote Chemmeen which depicts the life of the fisher-folk in the coastal areas of Kerala. In Tottiyude makan and Rantitangazhi, the note of social commitment is more pronounced. Kesava Dev also concentrated on the lives of the lower middle class, offering realistic portrayals of economic and social inequalities. Odayil ninnu, his outstanding novel, is on the life of a rikshaw-puller. His other novels include Bhrantalayam, Ulakka, Rowdy and Ayalkkar. Basheer, though as an artist more suggestive than outspoken, describes the various facets of the Muslim community in Balyakalasakhi, N'tuppappakkoranentarnu, Mantrikappuccha, Pathummayute atu, etc. The device of blending realism and romanticism is more manifest in the novels of S.K. Pottekkat—like Vishakanyaka and Oru deshattinte katha. A host of other writers like Uroob, E.M. Kovoor, M.T. Vasudevan Nair, Surendran, and Cherukad represent the different facets of realism in their novels.

In the field of short story too, the trend of realism became a powerful force. The major novelists like Thakazhi, Dev, Basheer, Uroob had all successful tried their hand in this field also; in fact, most of them seem to have begun with short stories and matured with the novels. In Malayalam, most, progressive ideas were disseminated through powerful stories. Thakazhi's important collections are Changathikal, Inquilab, Makalute makal, Atiyozhukkukal, etc, while Kesava Dev wrote Pravaham, Jivitachakram, Deenamma and Bhavi varan. Basheer pioneered the chain-story in Malayalam. Some writers have concentrated on portraying realistic pictures of their own communities, one of them being Ponkunnam Varki who wrote pungent stories on the Christians in Kerala, and the other, Lalitambika Antharjanam, who dwelt on the degeneration of the Nambudiri community, of which she is a member.

The influence of western realism was also seen in the field of drama, which earlier dealt only with puranic and historical themes. The drama of ideas represented by western dramatists like Ibsen, Chekhov and Bernard Shaw became a model for the Malayali writer, and contemporary issues became the subject of many realistic plays of the period. V.T. Bhattathirippad in Ritumati exhorted the progressive-minded Nambudiris to root out age-old superstitions and malpractices. Social realism is the driving force behind the plays of K. Damodaran (Pattabakki, describing the evils of the feudal order), V. Krishnan Tampi (Innatte vanita, on women's emancipation), K.T. Mohammad, Ponkunnam Varki, Chrukad, P.J. Antony and Thoppil Bhasi. Damodaran, Varki, Antony and Bhasi may be said to have openly and powerfully espoused political themes, with a pronounced communist bias. Bhasi's Muladhanam (Capital), Sarvekkallu (Survey stone) and the more forthright Ningalenne kamyunistakki (You made me a communist) were staged by the Kerala People's Arts Society (KPAC). A fresh note of realism under the direct influence of Ibsen was N. Krishna Pillai's Bhagnabhavanam which depicts the disintegration of an ordinary family. Recent interest in experimental techniques seems to have made the play in Malayalam move away from realism.

In the field of poetry, realism perhaps manifests itself as a movement more preocupied with the physical rather than the metaphysical world. Even though the trio—Vallattol, Asan and Uloor—heralded a new era of romanticism in poetry, Vallattol, charged with the spirit of nationalism, also used poetry for a contemporary social purpose, propagating the cause of freedom. The same note recurs in the poetry of G. Sankara Kurup during the middle period of this writing. During the later phase, N.V. Krishna Warrior spurns excessive romanticism and in his Ninta kavitakal (Long poems) and Kurekkuti ninta kavitakal (More long poems) opts for a balance between realism and imagination. Warrior was keenly aware of the changes in society like the mechanization in an urban society and the loss of personal identity. In his poetry, Warrior opposed injustice, oppression and inhuman cruelty. In K.P.G. Nambuthiri, Cherukad and the early poetry of O.N.V. Kurup, Vayalar Rama Varma and P. Bhaskaran, there is an unswerving allegiance to social realism in literature and Marxism in politics.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

In Malayalam, with the advent of 'modernism' in literature, realism as a movement began to decline. Modernist tendencies, such as a negation of the values of the past, nihilism, scepticism, existential anguish, identity crisis began to dominate Malayalam literature from the sixties, but whatever be its manifestation, realism still continues to survive as a mode of writing in Malayalam.

Su.G.

REALISM (Marathi). The concept of realism begins its journey towards being a full-fledged literary genre in the nineteenth century with Balzac in France through his La com'edie Humaine. He was the first author to project a novelist as a scientist historian, recording and classifying the social life of a country in all its aspects, to use the succinct description of Peter Mercer. The trend set by Balzac and Zola in France and Tolstoy in Russia became the standard bearer of realism, especially in the novel. If Balzac and Tolstoy are the pioneers of the 'realistic' fiction, Marx and Engels could be called the fathers of criticism of the realistic school. In addition to the 'accurate and complete' description of the factual details of individual and social life, Marx stressed another important feature of realism: the movement of history and the impact that it has on the social and individual life. Being a realist writer thus meant relating one's material, both human and non-human to a certain a view of history or a weltanschauung.

The doctrine of realism in literature led to certain problems before long. Unlike the historian or the sociologist a creative writer is essentially trying to create a form which can suffer if an author tried to be accurate and complete like a social scientist or historian. George Lukacs tried to solve the problem by making 'form' a legitimate concern of the realist writer by underlining the essentially 'social'character of form.

The 'realistic' doctrine of literature influenced a wide spectrum of Indian writing. In Marathi, the modern fiction began essentially as realistic writing. Beginning with Baba Padmanji's Yamuna paryatan, the first attempts were necessarily realistic in as much as they tended to be very exhaustive in their descriptions of individual and social life. They also related to a movement of history to the extent that they were products of the 'modernising' zeal of early colonialism. High point of this writing seems to have reached in the fiction of Hari Narayan Apte, who described in vivid detail the contradictions (and the hypocrisies as well) of the traditional society in the new modernist milieu.

Early in this century, however, the confusion between realism and naturalism had taken its toll. Rajwade, in his seminal essay on 'Novel' (1905), put his finger on it. Hari Narayan Apte was the only contemporary author that he was willing to spare. In his criticism he brings out yet another aspect which 'realism' should have legitimately claimed. It is the emphasis on the historical character of the narrative. Hence his regret that the Marathi (actually Indian) authors were unmindful of the possibilities of fantasy as a legitimate narrative form.

During the twenties and thirties Marathi fiction tended to become either romantic or naturalistic masquerading as realistic. Phadke and Khandekar (the Jnanpith Award winner) and Sane are the best examples of the former, and Varerkar of the latter. It is during this time that the debate shifted to a largely vacuous and scarcely well-defined problem of 'Art for Art's or Life's sake'. This debate created the false polarities of art and life, content and form, technique and creativity. It was only in the sixties that Marathi fiction achieved a new lease of life in writers like S.N. Pendse, G.N. Dandekar, Bhala Chandra Nemade, and Dalit writers like Baburao Bagul and Shankarao Kharat, who could be broadly put in the realist category. Non-realistic or anti-realistic writers like Kiran Nagarkar, Kamal Desai and Gauri Deshpande would be a few other names worth mentioning.

Realism seems to have been a dominant tradition in poetry though. Poets like Mardhekar, especially in his poems describing ennui of the industrial, urban life, wrote poetry in the best realistic tradition. In recent years Dalit poets like Keshav Meshram, Daya Pawar, Yashwant Manohar and Waman Nimbalkar and left-wing writers like Narayan Surve seem to carry the banner of the realist tradition.

In drama, naturalism has reigned supreme. The Indian People's Theatre Association (IPTA), which was a major all-India phenomenon of the late forties and early fifties, began with a great promise. But before long the IPTA took the road of socialist realism, thus effectively closing what might well have been a major chapter in the history of Indian (certainly so in Marathi, Bengali, Hindi, Urdu and Telegu) theatre. Maybe, the failure occurred because the IPTA writers and theatre workers were unable to make up their minds on the question of realism and its socialist version. It is important to note this, because the failure of socialist realism does not in any way limit the possibility of realism as a socio-historical philosophy of literature, and a few of the Dalit and other 'parivartanwadi' (preferring commitment to complete change) writings in Marathi give enough ground for confirmation of this idea.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ernst Bloch, et al, Aesthetics and Politics (1978); Georg Lukacs, Studies in European Realism (1960).

G.P.D.

REALISM (Oriya) The authors of the ancient and medieval phase of Oriya literature were mostly religious or romantic in their outlook. They were indifferent to socio-political changes and were primarily guided by the literary ideals expounded by the Sanskrit rhetoricians. Hence their works deal with the superhuman deeds of the mythological characters, such as Rama, Sita, Radha, Krishna and Gopis or the romantic love of imaginary princes and princeses, along with their personal and devotional experience. This trend continued almost till the later part of the nineteenth century.

Orissa came under the British rule in 1803. Consequently, a revolutionary change took place in the socio-political life of the people. The spread of English education and the oppression and exploitation of the foreign rulers and their callousness during the natural calamities like flood and famine roused consciousness of the people of Orissa. Till then Orissa, as a separate province, was non-existant. With the object of bringing together the Oriya speaking people residing in the neighbouring states, the people were united and inspired to improve their condition. As a result, a new type of literature was produced during this period, different both in form and in content. Poetry, drama, fiction and essay of this period were based on social themes. Many of the old beliefs were challenged and authors began to write against social prejudices in order to bring about reform in society. The traditional, mythical or romantic themes were discarded.

Radhanath Roy (1848-1908), Madhusudan Rao (1953-1912), Gangadhar Meher (1862-1924), and Nanda Kishore Bal (1875-1928) took the lead in the field of poetry, and Jagmohan Lala (1838-1913) and Ramshankar Roy (1856-1931) in the field of drama. Credit goes to Fakirmohan Senapati (1843-1918), who created a new tradition by introducing realism in his literary creations. In his novels and short stories, he gave a vivid and realistic picture of the feudal society of the mid-nineteenth century, and created living characters. In them we find a unique combination of idealism and social realism. During this period Nanda Kishore, in his poems, gave expression to rural life with its rustic simplicity and pastoral beauty in a realistic manner in the language spoken by the country folk. Moreover, there was a direct impact of western literature on all the genres of Oriya literature during this period.

It may also be admitted that the romantic trend still persisted along with the new trend of realism. But very soon the leftist political ideology for the first time was introduced in Oriya literature. As a result, in the later works of many romantic poets we see a new realistic awareness and social consciousness. This is evident from the poems of Baikuntharath Pattnayk (1904-1978), Mayadhar Mansinga (1906-1973), Kunjbihari Das (b.1914), Nityananda Mohapatra (b.1912), Gyanindra Verma (b.1918), Krushna Chandra Tripathy (b.1911),etc.

In 1935, an organisation named 'Nabajuga Sahitya Sansad' was formed by a few political workers, who were influenced by the ideology of the Communist Party of India. In 1936, Audhunika, a literary journal, the mouthpiece of this organisation, was brought out. Bhagabati Charan Panigrahi (1908-1943), Anant Patnaik (1913-1987) and Gurucharan Patnaik were the founders and organisers of this organisation. They wrote stories, poems and essays depicting the ideals of a classless society free from exploitation. This was in fact a revolt against the traditional elitist literature. It emphasised socialist realism and portrayed the dreams of socially oppressed and exploited people. This trend has continued even after Independence. Sachi Rautroy (b.1918) and Manmohan Mishra (b.1924) took the lead in writing poems and songs depicting these revolutionary ideas. In the field of drama, Kalicharan Pattanayak (1898-1978) brought the social themes to the forefront.

The novels and plays written during this period depicted the grim realities of society, evils of untouchability, sufferings of the widows, social injustice, economic exploitation, and sufferings of the common man living in the countryside. This trend is reflected in the realistic novels and short stories written by Kalindi Charan Panigrahi (b.1901), Kanhucharan Mohanty (b.1906), Gopinath Mohanty (b.1914), Kamalakanta Das (b.1906-1981), Rajkishore Patnaik (b.1912) and Nityananda Mohapatra (b.1912). It may be admitted that realism, instead of being borrowed from or imposed by the west, became a natural phenomenon. Besides, the spread of the

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

Gandhian Movement and the people's movement in the princely states of Orissa reinformed the trend of realistic depiction of the conditions of the common people.

The literature produced after Independence also depicted realistic themes, social problems and frustrations of the people such as unemployment, oppression, poverty, corruption in public life, etc. Among the poets of the period Janaki Ballabha Mohanty (b.1925), Chintamani Behera (b.1928), Sitakanta Mohapatra (b.1937), Ramakanta Ratha (b.1934), Brajnnath Ratha (b.1936), SaubhagyaKumar Mishra (b.1941), Rajendra Panda (b.1944), Rabi Singh (b.1932), Kamalakanta Lenka (b.1935), etc. are notable.

In the field of drama, Gopal Chhotaray (b.1920), Ramachandra Mishra (b.1921), Bhanjakishore Patnaik (b.1922), Kamala Lochan Mohanty (b.1921), Laxmidhar Nayak (b.1914), Pranabandhu Kar (b.1914), Manoranjan Das (b.1923) took the lead in portraying the weakneses of the men in power. The novelists of the post-war period took new characters from the lower strata of society, such as the tribals, fishermen, untouchables as well as a new class of political manipulators, drug addicts, criminals, unemployed youth, working girls, ruined landlords, call-girls, etc. in their works. Writers like Surendra Mohanty (b.1920), Bibhuti Patnaik (b.1937), Santanukumar Acharya (b.1922), Prativa Roy (b.1944) may be mentioned in this context.

In the field of short story the authors have shown their excellence in depicting the realistic picture of society with its complexities. Stories of Kishoricharan Das (b.1924), Bibhutibhusan Tripathy, Akhilmohan Patnaik (1927-1983), Achutananda Pati (b.1926), Manoj Das (b.1934), Ramachandra Behera, Tarunakanti Mishra, Rabi Patnaik, Basantkumar Satpathy, Rama Chandra Mishra, (b.1915), Mohapatra Nilamani Sahu (b.1926), Udayanath Sarangi, Choudhury Hemakanta Mishra (b.1938), etc. may be mentioned as examples.

Depiction of society as it is, notwithstanding overt romanticism and the use of oranate language, has been the dominating literary credo in Oriya literature in this century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B. Patnaik, Sahityara suchi patra (Cuttack, 1987); Adhunik Oriya sahitya (Cuttack, 1984); J.B. Mohanty, An Approach to Oriya Literature (Bhubaneswar, 1988); Nabajugara kavi kavyadhara (Cuttack, 1981).

J.B.M.

REALISM (Punjabi) is marked by two phases which may, respectively, be termed as physical and social. Physical realism or proto-realism as it may be called, is abundantly available in 'Qissa' literature that had its origin in the middle period, but remained a part of the literary scene till the end of the nineteenth century. Through the primal narration of love-tales of Hir-Ranjha, Sohni-Mahiwal, Sassi-Punnu and Mirza Sahiban, proto-realism of qissa-literature questioned the system of marriage by parental choice that denied the lovers the right to love on their own initiative and will. Alongwith, it condemned the narrow bigotry of the priestly class that forebade love marriage and sanctioned the other kind. The judiciary of the age also came in for criticism on similar grounds.

This proto-realism derived its raison d' etre from the natural functions of the human body without entering the social terrain. In Hir-Ranjha, the terrain was of the village common land along the river Chenab, where, after leaving his own village, Ranjha used to graze the cattle of Hir's father. In Sohni-Mahiwal, this terrain contracted to the spot on the bank of the river where, in the darkness, Sohni had nightly tryst with her lover. In Mirza-Sahiban, its temporal duration was shortened to a moment when, after her elopement, the heroine allowed the hero to rest his head on her thigh, under the shade of a tree in the wood.

Eating, playing, loving and sleeping on the terrain, the lovers assumed a character completely disapproved by society and its institutions. For example in Hir-Ranjha, the main focus of the 'gissakar' is upon the thighs, buttocks, belly, nose and mouth of the heroine. In the description of the human body as approved by the social institutions, these aspects have a place, but only for characterisation and individuation.

Proto-realism remained the stance of realistic literature in Punjabi till the end of the nineteenth century. From the beginning of the twentieth century, it gave place to social realism. On account of the changes implemented under the direction of the British government, the social terrain became more important than the natural terrain of life. Instead of bodily activities, the focus of social realism has been upon social relations the portrayal of which has been an important concern of all forms of literature in Punjabi in the first half of the twentieth century.

It was on an incipient note that social realism had its beginning in the writings of Bawa Budh Singh and Charan Singh Shahid. Typical of this naive form of social realism is Chandra Hari, a play by Bawa Budh Singh. In it is drawn a vivid portrayal of the indiscretions resulting from the excessive authority the government officials have come to exercise, and the misalliances to which educated middle class young men are subjected through marriage by parental choice. The responsibility for these indiscretions rests mainly with the persons concerned. Nowhere is this responsibility traced back to their class-character, class-consciousness and their role at a particular historical juncture. As a result, it is social realism all right, but of a naive kind only.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Only in the progressive literature is there an effort made to involve class-character, class-consciousness and their symbiosis in life-like literary characters, their experiences, relations and values. The main stance of this lierature is the contention that the power of human experiences, relations and values is determined by the economic, social and historical forces working in an immanent and latent manner. Naturally, the efficacy and significance of the feelings, emotions, ideas and thoughts of individuals are proportionate to their groundedness in class-character and class-consciousness. The raison d' etre of this critical realism is Aristotle's ancient dictum that 'man is a social animal' which can be discerned as operative in the male and female speakers of the poems of Mohan Singh and Amrita Pritam, in the short stories of Sant Singh Sekhon and Kulwant Singh Virak and in the novels of Surinder Singh Narula, Gurdial Singh and Narenderpal Singh.

Critical realism, the central mode of creative writing in the thirties and the forties, became dormant during the fifties and the early sixties. The reasons for these contrary developments may be found in over-emphasis on the contradictions that, on account of the national war of freedom, were operative in the earlier decades and the under-emphasis on the contradictions under the Nehruite ideology, in the later decades. From the later part of the sixties, this critical realism has appeared with greater vigour and dynamism, evidences of which can readily be found in the short stories of Prem Prakash, and the poems of Avtar Pash and Surjit Patar. Along with historical realism, critical realism in these writers is fraught with the existential concerns of life.

Related to this critical realism is biological realism that has marked the contemporary writings of Balwant Gargi, Ajit Kaur and Narinder Pal Singh, as seen, respectively, in Dhuni di agg (Smouldering fire, 1969), Phaltu aurat (Extra woman, 1970) and Ba mulahza hoshiar (Attention, Cometh the king, 1974). In these writings the focus of delineation shifts to sex which becomes the sole measure of life, especially in its bio-psychopathic capacity. To emphasise this shift further, the incestuous and homosexual proportions of sex are brought into focus. Sceptical of history, this disposition hints towards the destiny of those classes or forces which have either lost faith in the efficacy of history or are being themselves deprived of historical efficacy. Critical realism offers hope, however, of containing these aberrations before they become destructive of national and indeed of human culture.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: I. Serabryakov, Punjabi sahit (Moscow, 1971); Sant Singh Sekhon, Parsidh Punjabi kavi (Ludhiana), Punjabi sahit vich yatharthvad (Ludhiana, 1975); Samkali Punjabi sahit (Ludhiana, 1970); Tejwant Singh Gill, 'Social Protest in Punjabi Qissa Poetry, in Journal of Medieval Indian Literature (Chandigarh, 1979), 'Quissa' in the times of Maharaja Ranjit Singh' in Maharaja Ranjit Singh and His Times (Amritsar, 1981); 'Punjabi Short Story' (1970-80) in Sirjana (October-December, 1981-.

Te.S.G.

REALISM (Rajasthani), in medieval Rajasthani literature, is almost conspicuous by its absence. All heroic and erotic literature adhered to a pattern which was essentially idealistic in its approach and the dark side of life was almost ignored. However, one could point out a case or two where a realistic touch may by seen. Durasa Adha, the celebrated poet of the seventeenth century, offers a telling description of the extreme hardships faced by people engaged in various professions. His Kartar bawani mentions fifty-two professions. Opa Adha, a nineteenth century saint-poet, lays bare the lives of such Charanas who suffer physical and mental afflictions while seeking alms from their patron. Another Charan poet admonishes himself to take to peasantry instead of begging from donors. A striking example of this kind may be seen in Chhapana ro chhand by Umardan Lalas, who describes the horrors of the 1899 famine and the wreteched life of the peasantry which suffered physical and mental agony. Nothing can be more realistic than his description of the movement of famished men and cattle. How the village girls and women in tattered clothes were molested by city-based goons, is very effectively described by the poet.

But realism became sharply pronounced after the advent of progressivism. The atrocities afflicted by feudal and capitalist forces on the under-privileged and downtrodden classes of society were described in a number of ways by writers. Vyas Ganesilal 'Ustad' denounced the entire class of exploiters in his poems. The socio-political conditions of the post-Independence period were also criticised by him in his poem, 'Ustadan riaan'. He was much influenced by Marxism. Just as idealism was expressed earlier in an exaggerated tone, so has realism been over done at several places. There was a loud denunciation of feudal and capitalist elements in society. Those writers, who had kept silent over the lot of the depressed people, came out now vehemently to criticise social evils. Annaram 'Sudama' exposed the village money-lending class in his novels, dramas and short stories. Nrisingh Rajpurohit presented a satirical picture of rural education entrusted to novices. R.D. Shrimali gave a realistic picture of the sufferings of people during famine, exposing the village landlords in collusion with the police.

When new poetry was ushered in, the upcoming

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

young poets became more vocal and presented a grim picture of society. As their writings are sometimes the outcome of their own frustration, they do not always carry conviction. Moreover, the new poets mostly look at the darker side of life. So far as Rajasthani literature is concerned, one may, therefore, generalize that realism, broadly speaking, is well expressed when the writers write about poverty, famine, corruption, social democracy, and evils and blemishes in our political life. The conflicts and struggles forming part of the metropolitan culture are yet to show up in this literature.

Raw.S.

REALISM (Sanskrit). A good deal of literature in Sanskrit is classical, romantic, devotional and spiritual. The idealism in these works is obvious. The hero—where there is one—is an ideal man or a god or a semi-god; the events involving the perfect characters are typical and the end is in a happy mould, often expounding a moral. The treatment of the outer world is selective, the guiding concern being the expression of the intended sentiment. Nature, a part of the outer world, is so selected and described as to serve the purpose of the sentiment.

In the midst of this literature, some works stand out as showing streaks of realism. Human nature is described as what it really is and the external world gets a more or less faithful treatment. Such works also do not point to an obvious ideal; the ideal is concealed and has to be surmised.

A vivid picture of India's social life, though in fragments, may be seen in such epics as the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. Later, it is in Bhasa's plays that we find a realistic treatment of life. Among his thirteen plays, the one that shows a whole world of realism is Charudatta, a play later used as a model for Shudraka's Mricchakatika. In Charudatta the hero is an impoverished but virtuous merchant and the heroine, a cultured courtesan in love with the hero. Perhaps for the first time in the history of Sanskrit literature the author moves out of the glittering royal court in search of hero and heroine, and the play consequently reflects the middle-class life. We also get a glimpse of the stark realism of political corruption. The king's brother-in-law is a law unto himself, and the lower class is represented by Sajjalaka, a thief.

Mricchakatika (The clay cart), a longer play than the incomplete Charudatta, has more or less the same story except that the events are carried forward here. The realistic features of Charudatta are found in this fuller play too. Sakara, brother-in-law of the king and a rejected lover of Vasantasena, the heroine, strikes her and she falls down unconscious. The crime is foisted on the innocent Charudatta who is condemned to be executed. Vasantasena, however, recovers in time and saves the condemned man. Earlier in the story, she sends some of her jewels to Charudatta's home in a clay cart which belonged to Charudatta's son. The play gets its name from this clay cart. The political realism of the later play covers a wider ground in not only because political corruption is sharply portrayed, but also because a radical solution is offered. Aryaka, whom Charudatta rescues from prison, marches on the city of the corrupt king—doubtless, a revolutionary deed. Mricchakatika is thus an outstanding example of realism in Indian drama.

A collection of fables which shows a good deal of realism is Panchatantara. A work in five parts, as the title itself indicates, this famous book expounds the realism of commonsense. It shows considerable insight into both animal and human nature. Vishnusharman's lessons to the princes, done through these stories, encompass reality on the level of conduct and the mind, and what is taught is often what is realistically feasible.

A third class of works noted for some kind of historical realism is the group of works on history. In Kalhana, author of Rajatarangini (1149), we find an example of historical realism. In fact, Kalhana describes good writing with the attribute 'bhutarthakathana' (a statement of what has happened), untouched by one's passions (ragadveshabahishkrita). In Rajatarangini basically a chronicle of the kings of Kashmir, the author's mind functions on another level of reality too. This is the level of the reality of destiny, a belief in an order of existence in which what has to happen necessarily happens. In his description of the kings and dynasties of Kashmir, Kalhana keeps this cosmic law of 'karma' in mind and gives his work the dimension of a supramundane realism.

An aspect to be noted about the Indian emphasis on realism is that the philosophic attitude towards the 'real' being 'really unreal', to some extent blunted the emphasis on realism. The tantalising phenomenon of writers maintaining their anonymity in their works is partly due to this attitude. Our attempts at reaching biographical realities in the study of works are frustrated by this fact. Realism thus in Sanskrit cannot be described as a dominant streak.

K.R.P.

REALISM (Sindhi), as a conscious movement, gained initial momentum in 1930s. Publication of Sindhi literary works based on realism was rather sporadic during the years 1930-56. However, the first short story based on realism was published in the Saraswati magazine in 1902 with the title 'Hura Makhia ja', which may be termed as, what in modern jargon is called, journalistic fiction. The story was authored by Lalchand Amardinomal.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Amarlal Hing'orani's two short stories entitled 'D'asu d'iyom ta kithan labhandi' (Tell me where shall I find her) and 'Ado Abdul Rehman' (Brother Abdul Rehman), which were published in the Pulwari magazine started by him in 1930, can be broadly termed as modern short stories based on realism. Hing'orani was a lawyer by profession and it does not escape one's observation that the clientele provided him with enough raw material and characters for depiction in his short stories. There are yet other stories of his published in the Saqi magazine in 1946 and 1947, which admit of his inclination towards realism.

About a dozen short stories by Mirza Nadir Baig were published in the Sindhu magazine during the years 1932-36. Out of these, in the stories like 'Mohinia ji diary' (Mohini's diary) and Achhut (The untouchable), Baig appears more realistic, and the rest follow the progressive trend.

Asanand Mamtora is at his best in the collection of his short stories, Jivat (The living, 1939). The characters in the stories are treated with psychological doses, and the narrative is lucid and gripping. Specially two short stories, 'G'anwarin' (The illiterate) and 'Vad'ero Ramzan' (Ramzan, the headman) are based on stark realism and demand special mention.

The full-blooded movement of realism in Sindhi literature is essentially the result of a confrontation between the progressive writers committed to ideology and other contemporary writers of the late 1950's. The angry young men of the latter group brought in a new, invigorating wind of change into the literary atmosphere of the day. This happened in 1958. The new writers, Mohan Kalpana, Guno Samtani and Lal Pushp, introduced a new philosophy to Sindhi literature, and characters and plots were given a new dimension in fiction. Of these three writers only Lal Pushp was neo-realistic in his approach. The other two were more romantic than realistic, although they, to an extent, did indulge in psycho-analytic techniques in their short stories. The psycho-analytic approach led in its own way to the depiction of reality of human behaviour. The basis of this new experiment was not only freudian, but also Jungian. The social reality gave place to the 'stream of consciousness' which now started taking roots in Sindhi fiction. The most successful among the contemporary writers depicting the 'stream of consciousness' was Lal Pushp. Many of his short stories in as many as nine collections, reflecting one or the other Freudian complex, reach a logical conclusion. Particularly, Punar milan (Meeting again, 1966), Khal-ee khal (Voids and voids, 1970) and Karaz ji darkhast (An application for loan, 1976) need special mention. There are a few stories of his like 'Hika sard deewar' (A cold wall), 'Boryata jo ahsas' (The time of ennui), 'Jawab jo maut' (Death of an answer) which stand apart from these complexes and reflect to some extent modern sensibility, though these cannot be assessed in terms of the 'new' story. More or less, psychic gelation is the main ingredient of Pushp's stories.

Mid-sixties yet witnessed another literary quarrel. Now this new batch of angry young men was more angry than the romantics and the contemporaries. These writers had naturally a new awareness of contemporary reality and of the changing Indian scene. They accused the 'stream' of consciousness' writers of unnecessarily probing the dark recesses of human mind and of producing in their works an uncalled for complexity. In fact, the modernists felt that the basis of the contemporary Sindhi fiction was crumbling and a new approach was needed in conformity with the changes which had so rapidly taken place. They insisted that the writer had to keep away from the Freudian filth and Jungian abracadabra in order to produce clean and healthy fiction.

Now, these new angry young men, the modernists, should be viewed, instead, as a rare example of the Sindhi greatness, the writers who were peculiarly responsive, especially in the mid sixties, to modern complexity. The greatness is in the effort itself, in variety of responses deliberately made to every possible level of experience.

The pioneers of the modern movement were Anand Khemani, Ishwar Chander and Vishnu Bhatia. They were followed by other writers like Harish Vaswani, K.S. Balani, Shyam Jaisinghani, Prem Prakash, etc.

In 1969, for the first time four Sindhi 'new' poets were presented to Sindhi readers in a special issue of the Sindhi Times. The poets were Harish Vaswani, Vasdev Mohi, Mohan Kalpana and Anand Khemani. This was a new poetry issue edited by Hiro Shewkani. The reaction of the readers was that of appreciation as well as doubt. And certain controversies ensued.

In March, 1974, a collection of anti-poems by Anand Khemani was published by Kalpana Kitab Ghar with the title Bimar pirhi (The sick generation). Some critics denounced the poems as filth, while some others pronounced them as the first real new-poetry published in Sindhi.

Anand Khemani's Bimar pirhi is not a collection of fragments, but a magnificent torso in which lineaments of anti-poems are visible to fix the head over. The introduction by Mohan Kalpana is a modest, masterly delineation of the work's dimensions and Khemani's deep identification. Some of the poems are shocking indeed, and strike against the well-established attitudes of thought and culture. But then, all this was done for depiction of modern realism in Sindhi poetry.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

Vasdev Mohi's collection of new poems entitled Tazad (contradiction) was again published by Kalpana Kitab Ghar in 1975. The Tazad is the most appreciated collection of 'new' poems by a single author. Hardly any adverse comment by the critics appeared. It seemed that Bimar pirhi acted as a shock absorber and smothered the ire of the traditionalists and paved the way for the acceptance of 'new' poetry.

Later, in 1974, Koonj-Kavita publications brought out a collection of poems by Harish Vaswani entitled 40-76. Harish Vaswani is considered to have initiated 'new' poetry in Sindhi.

Shyam Jaisinghani, in his collection of poems, Vichhotyun (The crevices, 1980), takes us to the world where souls are gnarled and the agony seems to be the only common measure of humanity. Mohan Kalpana's collection of poems Jahaz's je deck te (On the deck of a ship) could hit the news-stands only in 1983. Hari Kant's collections of poems entitled Ughara awaza (The naked voices, 1980 and Lapa bhari roshni (Handful of light, 1988) are set in the present time and imbued with a sense of a dread of encroaching authoritarian rule. The poems are full of pyrotechnics.

What distinguishes the above Sindhi 'new' poets is their compulsive urge to break through all barriers. They speak of their innermost thoughts and feelings and are always in the quest of the real, the stark, the bitter and the ugly.

In his collection of short stories entitled Navambar ji akhrin rat (The last night of November, 1976), Anand Khemani depicts the consciousness of a man exerting under the opposite forces of equal momentum, which have to be changed—the pulls as well as the momentum.

Going through the bulk of the stories of Vishnu Bhatia as compiled in Chandramukhi (1967) and Sija ja tukra (1972), one is confronted at certain places with flashes of artistic touches, but, on the whole, one would find only pernicious flareups, contradictions, structural deficiencies and romantic freaks. His earliest stories as compiled in Dil ji basti (Abode of heart, 1965) especially, are at once romantic and progressive.

Ishwar Chander belongs to the same school. Of course he has written too much and some of the stories may be termed as prosaic and stale, but most others are modernistic and representative. He has his own diction and tells the saga of his time. He deals with the human psyche in an objective way and depicts 'self-alienation' and 'fear' in a simple, explicit language. The collections of the best short stories to his credit are Mual Makoro (The dead ant, 1966), Panjhe-ee ghar mein (In one's own home, 1973), Sakht chahre varo manhun (A man with a hard face, 1980) and Munhinjyu sata kahanyun (My seven short stories, 1983).

K.S. Balani, who died young, was really an artist of no mean reputation. Although one of his stories 'Prabha ain Kranti' compiled in Kath je sanche mein (Within the wooden frame, 1971) is a 'stream' story and very successful at that, with symbolic narrative, yet the other stories like 'Kara jisma' (Defiled bodies) are modern short stories based on stark reality. He could have given much to Sindhi literature but for his untimely death.

Harish Vaswani is known more as a poet than as a short story writer. In December 1980, he brought out a compilation of his nine short stories 40-80. The story 'Silsilo' (The continuity) in the collection is nearer the contemporary reality.

Leaving apart his stories compiled in Nango asman (The naked sky, 1968), in the subsequent stories Shyam Jaisinghani is 'new'. Some of the stories, especially the "Kuey jo maut" (Death of a rat—on rat race) and 'Irado jad'ahin ain jian jo' (Intention as and when it surfaces—on self-alienation) in the collection of his short stories entitled Thongo (Knuckle, 1970) and his earlier short story 'Rirhandaru waqt' (creeping time—on the ravages of time) will ever defy time.

Prem Prakash has wonderful subjects and fine technique through which he depicts man's complex situations and his suffocating environs. In one of his short stories Parun (The roots) he is face to face with the desperate situation the destiny casts him into, and wages his lone war with his 'condition'. The efforts fail and he is resigned to his fate and bears with the curse. The compilation Villain (1976) contains some of his representative short stories.

The Sindhi new story is sweeping in its range; it questions the present value-system, makes gibes at what is wrong and attempts at imposing a new meaning on life. It is not really philosophical in content, but it has all the compulsions of philisophy about it. The technical level is high and the values that make a good story—compression, subtle tone and micro-surgical eye—strike many readers as of high standard.

The first Sindhi new novel entitled Hik shakhsa ji vasna (Lust of a man, 1970) was that of Anand Khemani. The novel is a modern Gothic Passion Play with animalistic overtones, yet it depicts the reality of life.

The second modern novel published in Sindhi was that by Lal Pushp entitled Huna je atam jo maut (Death of his self, 1973). Pushp is at his best in this novel. Rejecting the conventional form, he portrays an anti-hero who goes deep inside himself to find a reason of his peculiar behaviour he has hitherbefore not been aware of. The author has administered psychological overdoses to the characters in certain situations and made the passages incomprehensive. His function is thus reduced to an exhaust pipe. It is, however, a successful novel in the 'stream of consciousness' style and won the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1974.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The third 'new' novel (we may, perhaps call it a novelette) was brought out by Motilal Jotwani with the title Narangi traffic light te (At the amber traffic light). The novel opens with the onslaughts of tension nearly throwing to the wolves the hubsand-wife relations. It is a thoroughly enjoyable reading up to the four chapters and up to that limit it has a tense, easily followed story line, culminating in a breathless chase of emotions and feelings.

The next modern novel that was brought out by the Koonj publications in 1976 is Khahia je chautaraf (Around an abyss) by Shyam Jaisinghani. The book is on anti-sentiment of a character who is deeply involved in life, so much so that his detachment and coldness are a refusal to recognise any priority among objects and events. He clings to his 'self', seeks refuge in the self-created shell to keep away the pressures of sentiment compressed by the social milieu he is forced to live within.

The last 'new' novel brought out in Sindhi with the title Len bi is authored by Param Abichandani.

Prem Prakash is presently the only'new' playwright published in book form.

One of the plays by Prem Prakash entitled Morchabandi (The baricade, 1979) is a political satire. In Morcabandi Prem Prakash just succeeds in achieving sensationalism by combining a dilution of the complicated infrastructure of the 'new' drama with the all popular phenomenon—speed—which makes the work of art seemingly an achievement for excellence.

The bulk of the present-day Sindhi literature follows the trend of realism. However, there are a few fictioneers and poets who still produce erotic works.

P.A.

REALISM (Tamil), a modern phenomenon that emerged under socio-political upheavals in the mid-nineteenth century, slowly entered Tamil literature, especially in the field of novel, not as a movement, but as an alternative mode of representing the reality. The history of realism begins with B.R.Rajam Iyer's Kamalambal charittiram (The story of Kamalambal, 1896), but as Pudumaippittan has rightly observed, the first part of Iyer's work is novel inasmuch as it portrays the reality of life, but the second part is merely a dream. A.Madhavaiah's Padmavathy charittiram (The story of Padmavathy, 1898) is still another example of realistic writing in Tamil. In the same way, C. Subramania Bharati (1882-1921) and V.V.S.Iyer (1881-1925) have tried to depict realism as a mode of style in their short stories. Bharati's 'Railway station' and 'Kanthamani' (1919) and V.V.S.Iyer's 'Kulattankarai arasamar' (The Pipal tree near the tank, 1919) and 'Kamala vihayam' (1917) are the best examples of realistic writing in the field of short story. All these writers thus opened a new vista in the field of Tamil writing by introducing realism.

In the name of realism, however, a group of writers associated with Anandaviktan, a popular journal started in 1929, promoted sensational writing, leading to commercialisation of literature. But in the forties, Pudumaippitan and R.Shanmugasundaram adopted the realistic mode of writing seriously through their short stories and novels respectively. The latter tried to offer a 'slice of life' in his novels, 'letting the facts speak' for themselves. Pudumaippittan's 'Mahamashanam' (The great cremation ground) and Shanmughasundaram's Nagammal (1942) are the best examples of the new mode of realistic writing in Tamil.

In the sixties, C.S.Chellappa and over a dozen other writers wrote their novels in a realistic vein. Chellappa's Vadi vasal (Threshold, 1959), Sundara Rama Swamy's Oru puliyamarattin kathai (The story of a tamarind tree, 1966), T.Janakiraman's Amma vandal (Mother came, 1967), and Poomani's Piragu (Afterwards, 1979) are important landmarks in the field of the realistic novel in Tamil.

The impact of realism was dominant for some thirty years from 1940 to 1970. During the same period, the progressive movement also gained strength. Writers like T.M.C. Raghunathan, D. Selvaraj and K. Chinnappa Bharati started writing novels in the format of socialistic realism. Raghunathan's Panchum pasiyum (Cotton and hunger, 1953) is the first novel in Tamil reflecting this ideology. Now more than a dozen writers in Tamil championed the cause of the proletarian class. Chinnappa Bharati's Dhagam (Thirst, 1975) is perhaps the most outstanding novel belonging to this group, depicting socialistic realism. Most of the novels written during this period are, however, works of slogan-shouting and propaganda.

During the eighties, the concept of realism took a new turn in the hands younger writers under the influence of French neo-realism. They were also receptive to the works of Latin-American writers, especially Gabriel Garcia Marquez. Tamizhavan's Yeerkanave sollappatta manitharkal (The people already mentioned, 1985) narrates the story of a family against the time span of three generations on the model of One Hundred Years of Solitude by Marquez. In such writings, however, simplicity, one of the major qualities of realism, is lost in the process of de-coding the text.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In the field of drama, it may not be wrong to say that most of the Tamil plawrights have shown little interest in realistic writing. That is one of the reasons why good realistic plays are difficult to find in Tamil.

C.Ra.

REALISM (Telugu), as a trend in literary composition, was not popular in Telugu literature until after the Second World War. The beginnings of the trend can, however, be traced to the late nineteenth century. Gurazada's Kanyashulkam (1889), perhaps, is the first realistic work in Telugu, representing the spirit of the age. To reflect contemporary reality, Gurazada chose to use contemporary language in his play. His racy, colloquial style is deeply steeped in the local dialect. The writers of the pre-Independence era, like Gokhale, Karunakumara, Tripuraneni Ramaswami Chaudari, Gudipati Venkata Chalam, Kodavatiganti Kutumba Rao and others, created an atmosphere imbued with a new spirit of enquiry leading to a realistic understanding of the workings of the social and economic forces. They are practitioners of what we call 'critical realism' today. The ideas of dialectical or historical materialism and class conflict were still foreign to them.

The origin of 'committed' writing and socialist realism, however, is to be found in the inspiration provided by the Russian Revolution and the consequent founding of the first Marxist state in the world. The influence is not direct, but a great event like the Russian Revolution is bound to have a subtle impact all over the world. Even as early as 1928, Unnava Lakshminarayana makes a reference to it in his famous realistic novel, Malapalli. Indian writers like Premchand and Mulk Raj Anand, whose writings bear the impress of new realism, had a great influence on Telugu prose fiction. It was, however, in 1930s that Sri Sri heralded a new age in Telugu literature with his Mahaprasthanam in which he extolled Russia, praised Lenin, and vowed to dedicate his writings to the proletariat. 'Abhyudaya kavitvam' (Progressive poetry) was thus born and gradually it took roots in other forms of creative writing as well. Outstanding writers like Kodavatiganti Kutumba Rao, Chaganti Somayajulu, Rachakond Vishwanatha Sastry, Bina Devi, Kalipatnam Rama Rao, Vattikota Alwar Swamy, etc., wrote novels analysing the social problems of the day in the context of Marxist thought and class consciousness. Puripanda, Kundurti, Ajanta, Ramana Reddi, Arudra, Somasundar, Kaloji and others held the banner of revolt aloft in the field of poetry. In the field of historical and philosophical writing, Yetukuri Balaramamurty made a mark. If earlier realists employed colloquial language in their works, some of the new realists experimented with dialects.

The Revolutionary Writers's Association (Viplava Rachavitala Sangham) came into being in 1970 on the occasion of Sri Sri's sixtieth birth aniversary. This movement defines realism as a study of social relations on the basis of control of means of production, land being the principal one. It advocates armed revolution to end bourgeois social values and parlimentary democracy. It has chosen prose and lyric as forms most suitable for rousing the popular farm labourers, industrial workers and tribal people to action. Subba Rao Panigrahi, Gaddar, Sri Sri (of Jhanjha), K.V. Ramana Reddi and Vara Vara Rao propagated this movement. Tripuraneni Madhusudana Rao is their most vocal spokesman.

As against naturalism, critical realism and socialist reality of the revolutionary writers, we have a few writers who under the influence of Freud and Sartre have tried to explore the inner reality of man with the help of techniques like the stream of consciousness. Rachakonda Vishwanatha Sastry's Alpa jivi, Butchibabu's Chivaraku migiledi, Bhaskara Bhatta Krishna Rao's Velluvalo puchika pullalu, G.V. Krishna Rao's Kilubommalu, Vinukonda Naga Raju's Ubilo dunna, Navin's Ampashayya, N.R. Nandi's Drishti, Vaddera Chandida's Himajwala, R.S. Sudarshnam's Samsara vriksham, Vasamurty's Ihaparalu may be cited as outstanding examples of novels portraying psychological reality. But this can hardly be called a movement. In Telugu, the term 'realism' as a movement applies, perhaps, only to the revolutionary writings of today.

G.Sr.

REALISM (Urdu). There was no such term as 'realism' known in Urdu literature before the end of the 19th century, although a great realist, Nazir Akbarabadi, wrote his poetry in the middle of 18th century. It was the age of classical poetry. His greater contemporary, Mir Taqi Mir (1722-1810), steeped in classicism, left for us hundreds of lines of his exquisite ghazal which have the stamp of realism, a kind of direct poetry depicting his cruel age, the devastation of Delhi by the foreign invaders, the degradation of man under the incompetent rulers and the greedy amirs of the court, the conflict of Marathas and the Rohilas, the blinding of kings and the starvation of the people including the princesses of the Red Fort. His autobiography in prose is an authentic document of his age recording the lawlessness of the Empire, the movements of the plundering hordes and even the defeat of the Marathas on the battle field of Panipat. Later, in the middle of the 19th century, Ghalib (1797-1869) wrote the simple prose of the modern age without ornamentation.

It is surprising, yet creditable, that Urdu poetry was secular in the middle ages, and reflected social and political consciousness. It has recorded the intrigues of the East India Company, the defeat of Sirajuddaula in 1757 on the battlefield of Plassy, and other events leading to the slavery of the country, the revolt of 1857, the new awakening of the Indian people, the various phases of the freedom struggle, the revolutions of the 20th century and the achievement of Independence in 1947. After Jawaharlal Nehru's speech when India awoke to freedom at the hour of mid-night, it was Iqbal's poem which was sung in the Constituent Assembly: 'Saare jahan se accha Hindustan hamara.'

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Realism found poweful expression in the satire of Sauda (1713-1780), great poet of ghazal and qasida. His poems in Shehr ashob (On the ruin of a city) are very powerful social documents. Tazhik-e-rozgar (Denunciation of times) is the description of an impoverished horse of an impoverished nobleman, symbolising the political and moral decadence of the age.

With the final defeat of the Indians in the War of Independence (1857), the sun of Urdu poetry set. It was an age of decadence after Ghalib and Anees (1802-1874), reflecting spiritual crisis. At this moment of history appeared four great personalities who were exposed to English literature and European science. Syed Ahmed Khan of Delhi, later known as Sir Syed, was a reformer and educationist, the founder of Anglo-Muslim Oriental College on the pattern of Cambridge and Oxford, which became Aligarh Muslim University in 1920. His attention was drawn to modern knowledge and science by Ghalib before 1857 and was told in clear words: 'The worship of the dead was not creditable.' His close associate was a disciple of Ghalib, Altaf Husain Hali of Panipat (1837-1914). He was a poet and a critic who, for the first time, laid down the principles of criticism in Urdu, attacked the decadent poetry of ghazal and gave a call for revolution in poetry, along with his literary comrade, Mohammad Husain Azad of Delhi (1830-1910). The fourth one was a brilliant scholar and historian, Shibli Numani of Azamgarh. His approach to history was scientific in the sense that he believed more in the role of the people than the culture of kings. He criticised the older Muslim historians in no uncertain terms, who glorified, according to him, the despotism of the rulers of Asia. His history of the Persian poetry, Sherul Ajam in six volumes is a classic in which the socio-political background of poetry has been taken note of for the first time.

They were pioneers, yet they revealed the weakness of poineers. They wrote didactic poetry (Hali) and agitational verses (Shibli), literary histories (Shibli and Azad) and biographies (Shibli and Hali) and scientific essays (Sir Syed). Thus, they laid the foundations of the modern Urdu literature. This is known as the Aligarh Movement in Urdu literature. Azad and Hali laid the foundations of a new kind of 'Mushaira' where poems on specific themes were recited, and not the ghazals of old style. They believed in the interdependence of life and literature and called their poetry 'Natural poetry'. This was their definition of realism. Sir Syed was denounced by conservatives and the fundamentalists as a 'Kafir' and worshipper of nature. Their natural poetry was totally opposed to the fanciful and exaggerated poetry. Much of it has become outdated, but the greatness of this lies in the fact that it made the great writing of the future possible. The greatest poet of the Aligarh Movement was Iqbal, who acquired the status of a world poet. The Progressive Writers' Movement inherited his finest traditions and carried them forward.

The expression 'Natural poetry' did not survive. The beginning of the 20th century was the dawn of a new realism with Iqbal and his younger contemporary, Premchand, playing the leading role. The emergence of a new middle class gave it a new vitality. The freedom movement had started gathering strength and helped in moulding the consciousness of writers. Patriotism ran like stream of fresh blood in the veins of Urdu literature. Abul Kalam Azad, a disciple of Shibli, shot up like a fiery star on the firmament, and a young Aligarh student, Hasrat Mohani, after his graduation, went to prison instead of joining the Government service. He was a born rebel and revolutionary who joined the ranks of Tilak in the Congress. He studied Marx and Lenin in prison and called himself a Muslim socialist. He did not write much political poetry. His real contribution is in the field of love poetry full of robust earthiness. The beloved of his ghazal does not resemble the classical courtesan or the princess of the Mughal palace. She is an ordinary middle-class girl who would come out to meet her lover under the hot summer sun without shoes on her feet. As a fearless journalist, Hasrat Mohani stands on the same pedestal with Abul Kalam Azad, Maulana Mohammad Ali and Zafar Ali Khan, the brightest names in this field. This too was a process in the development of realism. With the exception of Maulana Azad, all others were poets. Azad's political writings had a poetic flavour and his vast erudition was delightful. This style was a little removed from the realistic style, but it gave fire and passion to his political rhetoric. Some of his court statements are master-pieces of literature.

Iqbal sang from prophetic heights. His realism had a philosophical framework. His direct statements against imperialism and its culture, and in favour of freedom and dignity of man are great examples of didactic poetry. In prose, the biggest contribution is that of Premchand, who blended his realism with idalism. The oppressed peasant of India comes alive on the pages of his novels and short stories. He not only depicted the tragedy of the peasant, but also his great strength. He lived in poverty to enrich Urdu language, and later Hindi also. He was inspired by Tolstoy and Gandhi, and towards the end of his life by the Russian Revolution and Gorky. The stamp of Gorky's Lower Depths is clearly reflected in the last story of Premchand called 'Kafan' (The shroud). This was the turning point in Urdu fiction, carried forward by Krishan Chander, Rajender Singh Bedi, Manto, Ismat Chughtai, Ahmad Nadeem Qasmi, Shaukat Siddiqi, Hayatullah Ansari, Khwaja Ahmad Abbas and many younger writers of the day. In between Premchand and the progressives stand some famous writers like Sudarshan, Ali Abbas Husaini, and Suhail Azimabadi.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In poetry the romantic revolt led by Akhtar Shirani and Josh Malihabadi was responsible for the change over from classicism to realism. Along with the social and political themes of the modern age the poetry of love and nature reflected modern sensibility expressed through fresh images taken from everyday life. The abstract concept of beauty of the classical period took the form of Indian woman in flesh and blood. This realism embraces the themes of the third world also where an epic battle is being fought for liberation aginst neo-imperailsim. The most representative names are those of Firaq Gorakhpuri, Hafeez Jullundhari, Faiz Ahmad Faiz, Akhtaruliman, Makhdoom, Majaz, Jazbi, Jafri, Parvez Shahidi, Qasmi, Kaifi, Sahir, Majrooh, Nazish Partapgarhi and the younger poets like Ahmad Faraz, Zohra Nigah, Famida Riaz, Sajida and Zahida Zaidi, Shaz Tamkinat and many others. They include radicals and rebels both. The latest expression of realism in Urdu is the poetry of protest.

A.S.J.

REDDY, BALA SHOWRI (Hindi; b. 1928) was born at Gollala Gundur in district Cuddapah, Andhra Pradesh. He is the editor of Chandamama (Hindi) a popular children's magazine published from Madras. Quite early in life he freed himself from linguistic inhibitions when he met Mahatma Gandhi during his visit to Madras, and soon turned a multilinguist. He wrote novel after novel in Hindi from 1954 onwards. He has written some forty-five books in Hindi, the more popular among them being Zindagi ki rah (1962), Yah basti ye log (1963), Bhagna seemayen (1965), Sabri (1959), Davanal (1979), Swapna aur satya (1968), Baristar (1967), Lakuma (1969), Professor Prakash aur Purchayen (1971). To him writing was not for living but for service to society, as he strongly reacted to the terrible sight of our society writhing under the evils of dowry, unemployment, poverty and ignorance, while politics became caste-oriented. He felt the futility of law trying to bring about the desired social change, and so he grasped his pen to prove that it could be mightier than the legislature. His merit was soon recognised, and he received several awards and honours. The crowning glory of his literary career came in 1983 when the third World Hindi Conference at Delhi honoured him. Reddy's magazine for children, Chandamama has won great popularity all over the country. It offers to children good reading material, and entertains as well as enlightens them.

D. Su.

REGE, PURUSHOTTAM SHIVRAM (Marathi; b. 1910, d. 1978), distinguished Marathi poet, began to write when he was still at school, where he was introduced to Sanskrit literature by his teacher, Moreshwarashastri Kale. His first book of verse Sadhana was published during his last year at college in 1931. The same year he left for England where he studied at the London School of Economics for three years. On his return he began his professional career as a lecturer in Economics, a subject which he taught at various colleges till his retirement.

Phulora (1937), the first collection of poems written after his return from England, contained, what Rege was to declare later, 'the creative principle at work in various forms in life and the embodiment of this principle in female form in human life'. The book was dedicated to the poet's mother and to his beloved, and has poems like 'Abhisarika' which carry the rhythm of short-lived expectancy so characteristic of his work. Phulora was followed by Himaseka (1943) and later Dola (1950). Rege says that his main interest is in the detail and not in the totality, that he is more intent on capturing the intensity of one among many experiences than dwelling on their variety. He describes the process of his poem-making thus : 'The starting point is simple enough—something small and special in some incident, a word uttered, a thought which enters the mind while one is reading something... A line takes shape. One feels that one wants to put aside everything and start writing.'

The poems in Dola are vignettes on the borderline of the lyric and the Sanskrit 'muktaka'. The language is unadorned, striking at the very root of utterance itself, and its brevity offers strange and strong support to the meaning. The meaningful alliteration in 'Lampata ole vastra howuni, anga anga tava limpuna ghyave', expressing the rhythm of the poem, becomes its essence.

In the poems of Gandharekha (1954) words embody even more sharply the impress of an experience. Then came Pushkala (1960) and some of its poems closest to his heart. He felt that words here, while they retained their 'word-being', reached out beyond the familiar to suggest unexpected shades of feeling.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

By and large, the creative principle in his poetry works through the elemental forces in nature and the female form. Wind and water, eyes and lips mingle effortlessly. For instance, in the poem 'Punarbhet' (in Dola), space is crowded into the beloved's eyes, blue mountainsides lean on her lips, long drawn-out ploughed furrows line her cheeks. In Pushkala, however, these forces of nature determine the tempo of a dialogue, its texture and even a relationship. In Dusara pakshi (1966), the poems reach a further point of complexity, and the poems in Priyal (1971) represent continuation of this process. Perhaps one misses in Rege's poems a sharp awareness of the contemporary world, but if the poet mentions its existence (e.g. in 'Paper' from Gandharekha), it is as though he was reminding himself or the reader that, if he chose to, he could write in that vein too.

When Rege does write on an event of crucial or natural import (like Gandhiji's death), he brings it within the vortex of his own vision of me, you, and the world dissolved in one.This is in sharp contrast with B.S. Mardhekar's poem on the same event where man's indifference to what has happened is conveyed with force and immediacy. The single-minded devotion to his own experience is evident even in Rege's approach to the writings of others. In the early sixties, he translated some works of Brecht and Pasternak. His critical articles in Chhand, which he edited for six years (1954-60), also bear the stamp of his own creative process.

Rege's preoccupation with this dissolution of separateness or rather merging of identities to embrace all creation is extended to his prose writing. His collection of short stories Roop-katthak (1956) and Manava (1968) suggest, with the utmost sophistication, a mood, a situation, with woman in focus. This is also true of his plays Rangapanchalika ani dona nataken (1958). They are only another version of his poetry. Rangapanchalika, based on an episode in the 'Virata parva' of the Mahabharata has Uttara begging Brihannala to guide her brother's chariot and bring back trophies from the battle — the enemy's banners to clothe her dolls. Once victory is won, Brihannala is revealed as Arjuna, and Uttara is to be given away in marriage to his son Abhimanyu. Did Arjuna go to battle because she begged him to? Or was she only a link in his total destiny to fight the Kauravas? She had surrendered and dictated her first awareness of womanhood to Arjuna and she can now only re-live the tremulous ecstacy of that moment as she prepares herself to face life as his daughter-in-law. The mood of acceptance appears again in 'Kalayavana' where nobody can define Krishna (even as they all seek desperately for him) except for Radha and perhaps Kubja (Why impose the fetters of coming and going on him? All paths must be left free for him. Where he goes will be our path. There is no other. Each has to be all). The vision is expressed again in his prose works Savitri (1962) and Avalokita (1964), and to some extent, in Renu (1973) and Matrika (1978).

Urvashi, Ahalya, Radha are all names that clothe the same experience—one brief instant of joy with the self, annihilated and forgotten—which places Rege in the mystic tradition, but with a modern slant of self-denigration, amounting to sarcasm. There is no romance in Rege's work, no earthiness, not even eroticism in the accepted sense. The brief moment of physical intimacy may be savoured, treasured, only as a timeless instant of joy, but it is a meeting of bodies:

> Far, far from beyond
> Wind's impetuous haste,
> I only repeat what I can tell,
> After here there is nowhere.

The rhythm in his writing is carefully wrought and words are 'created' to match a mood ('Tridha Radha' in Gandharekha or the last word 'udasini' in 'Khuna' from Pushkala). Marathi gender being grammatical and not natural (as in English), Rege uses inanimate objects ('Kalokh' - darkness - masculine; 'Khidki' - window - feminine in the opening page of Avalokita) to anticipate the arrival of a visitor, the setting for the start of a relationship.

Time, place, age, physical characteristics are subordinated to the need to capture the experience of coming together, to the realisation that it cannot be stretched, that it does not have either a past or a future. In a sense, this vision frees Rege from the confines of any 'school' of poetry and places him in a class by himself with no ancestors or descendants. His unique contribution to Marathi literature was recognised not only in the numerous awards which his works received, but also in his election as President of the Marathi Sahitya Sammelan in 1969.

Perhaps, the quotation from Ludwig's Goethe, which Rege used to introduce Avalokita, is true of his own writing:

> 'As with Leonardo and Kepler so with Goethe casual experience was raised to vision, and vision widened to embrace the form: for it is with these phenomena as with poems - I did not make them, they made me.'

Ku.M.

REGE, SADANAND SHANTARAM (Marathi; b. 1923) taught English at Ram Narain Ruia College, Bombay. A writer of varied literary forms, fantasy and farce go hand in hand in his writings.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

His Jivanachi vastre (1952), a collection of stories, gives us a sharp insight into the prevalent inequality in our social system. The influence of Chekhov is evident in his writings. Chandava (1959) and Masa ani itarkatha (1965) are among his other collections of short stories.

Aksharvel (1957), his first collection of poems, is mainly nature poetry. The pictorial quality of his poems and their vivid imagery won him acclaim as a poet of promise. Drifting occasionally into abstraction, his poems like 'Bhaas' and 'Matpritichya kabaripashi' reflect the spirit of resignation. Chandoba chandoba (1959) and Zopalyachi baag (1965) are his books of verse for children.

Rege went to Norway on a Scandinavian Fellowship for Cultural Studies in 1961. He studied the Norwegian language and in 1963 translated Ibsen's Brand (1866) into Marathi. His other translations of the Western classical plays include Jayaketu (1959), Badshah (1966), Gochi (1974) and Raja Oedipus (1977). His translation of V. Mayakovsky's poems Pant ghatalela dhaag (1972) won him the Maharashtra State Award and also the Soviet Land-Nehru Award.

La.B.

REH, VASUDEV (Kashmiri; b. 1926) was born in circumstances of abject poverty. His health was poor in his childhood and the most unfortunate thing that could happen to him was that he went blind early in childhood. He could not continue his studies. However, his friends would read to him and thus he became familiar with Urdu and Hindi poetry. He was influenced by the Progressive Movement and composed poems on patriotic themes. He is a staunch supporter of national integration, secularism and socialism. He has a sensitive ear for the musical and rhetorical qualities of the language, but is defficient in visual imagination. His poetry often lacks metrical accuracy. The first collection of his poems is entitled Shabgard (Night watchman,1964) which is full of beautiful phrases and alliteration.

Sh.S.

REHBAR, AVTAR KRISHEN MAM (Kashmiri; b. 1933) is a well-known short story writer, playwright and critic. He did his M.A. from the University of Kashmir, joined Khalsa School as teacher to start with, and then worked with the Department of Census as Socio-economic Investigator for some time. Later on, he joined Radio Kashmir, Srinagar, as script-writer and is now a Producer there.

His works include Tobruk (1958), a collection of short stories, Mokhta lar (1959), and in collaboration with Naji Munawar a collection of short stories for children and Kashri adbuk tarikh (History of Kashmiri literature, 1965), which received the State Academy of Art, Culture and Languages Award, and Kashur nasr (Anthology of Kashmiri prose, 1967). Some of his short stories have been translated into different Indian languages. His plays, Talaash, Wolherish, Badshah, Reh ta aab, Ba chus choor and Deda rein are considered significant contribution to Kashmiri literature.

C.L.C.

REHBAR, HANSRAJ (Hindi; b. 1913) was born in a village of Patiala state. A writer with leftist political leanings, he was arrested for his anti-government activities first during the 'Quit India Movement' of 1942 and then during the Emergency (1977). His first work was published in 1938. Since then he has been continuously writing. His major literary works are: Fiction: Uphas (1947), Nav kshitij (1947), Dharati ki beti (1947), Kankara (1953), Kissa tota padhane ka (1971), Mithak ki maut (1971), Adim purkhe (1977), Dishahin (1980); Criticism: Premchand—jiwan aur krititva (1950); Pragativad punarmulyankana (1966); Translation: Khandahar (1977); Others: Jawaharlal Nehru benakab (1969), Ghalib benakaab (1970); Gandhi benakab (1971); Yodha sanyasi Vivekanand (1979); Bina reedh ka adami (1979); Tilak se aj tak (1980) and Mao tse Tung (1982).

He has also translated short stories of the Urdu writer Shaukat Thanvi. Kissa tota padhane ka is a satire in which the author, through the hero Manisha, tells us how the idealism of an intellectual is shattered by temptations offered by wealthy people in modern society, which is greatly influenced by the capitalist system and is manipulated by it to its own advantage.

The story of Adim purkhe goes back to the prehistoric age. Revealing how the matriarchal society was replaced by the patriarchal society, it enables the readers to understand the history, philosophy and development of mankind from the Marxist point of view.

Gov. R.

REKHTI (Urdu) is a form of verse peculiar to Urdu poetry in which the poet assumes the persona of a woman and gives voice to her emotions and feelings. But it is not merely a woman's outpourings of the heart. The special characteristic of rekhti lies in an unrestrained expression of a woman's sensuous desires and sexual urges. That is why it frequently touches the fringe of obscenity, lustfulness and moral degeneration. The language being absolutely that of women, rekhti thrives in the special idioms, mannerisms and accents of women. That was why Hashmi Bijapuri characterised rekhti as 'Ui ki booli' (Language of female mannerism). In India, the segregation of sexes stood as a stumbling block hindering easy communication between men and women. This is the reason why there was a substantial amount of difference between men and women not only in their attitudes, preoccupations, habits and manners, but also in the language used by them. Many words used by men unabashedly could not be used by women because of their natural shyness and modesty. Hence they communicated their intentions through suggestions and the use of metaphors and symbols. In this way, their language came to acquire a characteristic of its own, quite distinct from that used by men. The age-old beliefs and superstitions of women also gave birth to new coinages or the old words came to acquire rich, associative meanings, in addition to their literal ones. The prayers of women, their blessings and good wishes, even their abuses and curses, were invested with a special meaning and all this became an integral part of rekhti.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The main motifs of rekhti are the manners and customs of women and their emotions and feelings. It also gives an insight into the society and culture of a certain period in Indian history. The poets of rekhti have preserved for posterity women's dresses, jewelleries, the elaborate paraphernalia of female beautification, articles especially used by women, their beliefs and superstitions, in their couplets. A searching analysis of these elements reveals a certain stage in the cultural life of that period with which the new generation is not acquainted. Thus, rekhti preserves that period from the ravages of time.

There are basic differences between the language and diction of ghazal and that of rekhti. The symbols used in ghazal are so rich in suggestiveness, flexibility, subtlety and comprehensiveness that not only did ghazal express effectively the finer and deeper feelings of humanity down the ages, but also became a mirror of contemporary life.

In rekhti, the poet does not concern himself with such deeper questions as the relation of man with the universe, nor does he analyse the feelings of the individual from a cultural perspective. Rekhti-poets had no interest either in mysticism or philosophical questions, nor did they have any didactic purpose. Thus, while ghazals are full of insight into the reality of things, rekhti deals with trivial experiences and the little joys and sorrows, follies and foibles of humanity. While ghazal touches the height of imagination, rekhti derives its sustenance from the psychological analysis of women and the voluptuous aspects of their personality. Most of the poets wrote rekhti in imitation of the structure and style of ghazal.

As a literary form, rekhti had a dubious reputation. It was the product of a decadent culture and was obsessed with sensual and sexual pleasures, and wallowed in obscenity and lustfulness. Like other forms of Urdu literature, rekhti also had its origin in the Deccan. The first Urdu poet who wrote rekhti was Lutfi, though in his compositions the elements of rekhti are rather scanty. Shahbaz Husaini, Malik Khushnud and Hasan Shauqi are the poets who made significant contribution to this form of poetry. In the complete works of Ali Adilshah Sani (1638-1672), four rekhtis have been included. The important thing about these rekhtis is that we find no trace of obscenity or sexual perversion in them. The rekhtis of Shahi are sophisticated and elegant. In this regard, the name of Hashmi is also important. He was the court-poet of Ali Adilshah Sani. Hashmi was the first poet who invested rekhti with its special characteristics. In the rekhtis of Hashmi, we get a true picture of a woman of that time. The poet has thrown light on the dresses, jewelleries, domestic articles, intoxicants, etiquette of the dining table and the different ways of female beautification. Muazzam also wrote rekhti, but he did not seem to be interested in it.

If we take into account the poets of Golkonda, the name of Mohammad Quli Qutb Shah comes foremost to mind. The apt and competent treatment of the motifs of rekhti establishes him as the best rekhti-poet of the period. In his rekhtis, Quli presents himself as the 'Shama' (the candle) and his twelve beloveds as 'Parwanas' (moths). Every beloved wants proximity with Quli by drawing his attention to herself and this creates rivalry and competition amongst them. In the rekhtis of Quli, we find greater dynamism and multiplicity. Wajhi uses such vulgar words as 'boond' and 'lal' for the beloved. Some rekhtis can also be found in the works of Ghawwasi, but the special feminine quality is lacking in his diction and language. Abdullah Qutb Shah was also a notable writer of rekhti.

The rekhtis of Vali, Ein Fatah, Khaki, Rahim, Shah Turab and Shah Kamal demonstrate that after the downfall of Golkonda and Bijapur, this form of verse fell from grace. The loss of the prosperity of Bijapur and Golkonda sounded the death knell for the poets practising rekhti. During the time of Asaf, Ashiq and Qais tried to restore rekhti to its original status by injecting new life into it.

In Lucknow, Sadat Yar Khan Rangin (1756-1834) left behind a complete collection of rekhti. He achieved such reputation that he came to be regarded as the inventor of this form. Rangin himself used to take pride in his reputation as a poet of rekhti. Insha also practised rekhti alongside ghazals and became the spokesman of the feelings and emotions of women. Besides Rangin and Insha, Makhluq, Basant and Jan Sahib also took interest in it. Jan Sahib was a poet of repute in Rampur. In fact, after Rangin and Insha, Jan Sahib gave a new lease of life to rekhti. He also referred to the political turmoil and literary activities of his day in his poetry. The first collection of rekhti by Jan Sahib was published in 1845. The other notable poets of rekhti were Asmat, Nazneen, Tasavur, Afaq, Nuktachin, Mohsin, Shaida, Anqa, Qudrat, Pari, Abid Mirza Begum and Ashufta.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

As a form of literary art, the distinctive quality of rekhti lies in the fact that it is entirely original.

Sy.J.

RELATIONSHIP (English), a poem by Jayanta Mahapatra, published in 1980 by the Greenfield Review Press, New York, won the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1981. The poem is an attempt at the exploration of Indian sensibility, with all its myths and mystery, expressed in vivid and striking images.

The locale of the poem is Orissa and the poet seeks to describe its culture, its fairs and festivals, and the mysterious symbols of the deeper inner world. There are references to the Konark temple in the poet's search for the beatific vision, the deity of Jagannath representing the synthesis of all culture, the golden deer that enticed Sita in the Ramayana and the early conquest of Kalinga by king Ashoka. The architects are not merely 'artisans of stone' but also 'messengers of spirit', while the idol of the deity symbolizes the 'grotesque dawn of wilderness wood'. The poet delves deep into the mysterious world that transcends 'man's consciousness', intensely aware that his 'memories are just voices of another world', and he finally bids farewell to the haunting fear of guilt, wondering if there is 'anything beyond me which I cannot catch up'. Sharp and scintillating images strike the reader—images, like the 'tapestry of the year's first rain', 'warm indigo waters of the tropics', 'brassy October afternoon', 'diamond navel of shrines', sleep that is 'a song', 'a coarse cage that can hold a larger life'.

The western influence, particularly that of T.S. Eliot, is unmistakable, but Jayanta Mahapatra's quest for his own identity is voiced in an idiom that bears the stamp of his own individuality:

> Time > and the boat > and the initiation with the mystery of peace.

C.M.K.

RENAISSANCE (Assamese) was a late development, comparatively speaking. The renaissance as noticed in Europe in the 15th and 16th centuries or to a certain extent in the 19th century Bengal did not take place in Assam, though some of its characteristics may been seen in the 16th century Assam in the wake of the neo-Vaishnavite revival initiated by Shankaradeva. This was not merely a religious and reformative movement: it also affected other aspects of life. It was a period of regeneration of literature, music, dance and drama as well as wood-sculpture and miniature painting

Some scholars are of the view that the romantic period of Assamese literature was a period of renaissance. This is, however, only partly true, because the new movement was confined to literature alone. The works of the English and Bengali romantic poets inspired the Assamese youth of Calcutta to organise a literary club, known as the Assamese Language Inprovement Society of the Assamiya Bhasar Unnati-sadhini Sabha in 1888, which published a magazine called Jonaki from 1889. This monthly magazine ushered in the romantic trends in Assamese literature. A widening of imaginative sensibility, love of nature, glorification of the past, respect for unsophisticated life and humanism which characterise the romantic literature of England and Europe also mark the Assamese literature written by the writers of the Jonaki period. The emergence of short story, novel, narrative poetry and the lyric in all its varieties, the rediscovery of the ancient heritage and a revaluation of the early literature are some of the trends of this literary movement. The movement was spearheaded by Laksminath Bezbarua, Hemchandra Goswami, Chandrakumar Agarawalla and Padmanath Gohain Barua. The writers not only drew inspiration from English litterateurs of the romantic period, but also borrowed technique and ideas from the earlier writers like Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden, Pope, Swift and others. The Bengali writers like Michael Madhusudan Dutt, Bankimchandra Chatterjee, Hemchandra Banerjee, Nabinchandra Sen, and above all Rabindranath Tagore exerted a considerable influence on the Assamese writers. This romantic trend in literature lasted for nearly fifty years to be replaced by the modern trends towards the end of the forties of this century. But the movement did not affect any other field of arts and science. Even the social and religious reformative attempts, so pronounced in Bengal, were negligible in Assam. A small middle class, consisting of the educated people and the businessmen, was mainly involved in regenerating the literature after the set-back it had received as a result of the prominence given to the Bengali language in schools and administration for forty years. The growth of the national movement spearheaded by the Indian National Congress gave a further fillip to the patriotic urge to revitalise society through the medium of literature. But it must be admitted that except literature and language there was no perceptible flowering of other branches of arts and science. So, the renaissance in the true sense, as noticed in Europe or in Bengal, did not take place in Assam; it was mainly confined to the sphere of literature and only partly affected by social and political consciousness. The scene, however, has changed since the attainment of Independence.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

S.S.

RENAISSANCE (Bengali). The first stage of the Renaissance in Bengal came with the administrative reorganisation in the 1770's which emphasised the importance of the Bengali language. Nathaniel Halhed's Grammar of the Bengali Language was published in 1778 by Charles Williams, who had already completed a set of Bengali types and established the first vernacular press. In 1780 Williams published Hickey's Gazette, the first English newspaper in India, and in 1783 he translated the Bhagavat Gita into English. With the foundation of the Asiatic Society of Bengal in 1784 the British interest in Indian culture was further boosted, and in 1791 a Hindu College for the cultivation of Indian culture was proposed. The Sanskrit College at Banaras was established in 1792, and the Fort William College at Calcutta followed in 1800. The same year the Serampore Mission was established and the first translation of Matthew's Gospel was published by it. Numerous books in Bengali came out between 1800 and 1833. The contribution of the scholars at Fort William College towards the development of Bengali prose was also considerable. Raja Rammohun Roy (1774-1833) wrote to Lord Amherst in 1823 that English education be made available to all people in India, and in 1824 he wrote to the Rev. Henry Ware of Boston that the highest and the lowest of the Bengalis wished to learn English and that adequate teaching of English needed to be taken up. Following Macaulay's recommendations the government introduced English in place of Persian which had been in use in India for the last six hundred years. The stage was thus set for a new awakening.

The cultural and intellectual stirrings which had begun in the 1770s and 1780s witnessed momentous changes in all spheres of life in the nineteenth century. The development of various socio-cultural activities in Bengali heralded the Renaissance which later radiated throughout India. There was a vigorous interaction between religious and social reforms and literary flowerings. Raja Rammohun Roy happens to be the torch-bearer of the Renaissance, and his letter on English education has often been regarded as its manifesto. An urge for the discovery of man in a process of the discovery of the world with renewed vigour and inquisitiveness had now begun. Individualism, humanism, scientific outlook and rational approach to life became a corollary to the blossoming of the Renaissance spirit.

Raja Rammohun Roy, well-versed in Hindu, Muslim and Christian scriptures, was eclectic in his religious outlook and attempted to synthesize the best thought of the East and the West. He strongly criticised the religious superstitions and perversions among the Hindus. A pioneer in educational and social reforms, he was one of the first Bengali journalists. He published, between 1815 and 1817, the Bengali translations of two Vedanta texts and five of the major Upanishads. In 1828 he and his friends founded a new theistic society, the Brahmo Sabha, which was the beginning of a movement with far reaching influence on the life and culture of Bengal. Rabindranth's grandfather Dwarkanath Tagore, Prasanna Kumar Tagore, Chandrasekhar Dev and Tarachand Chakravarti were his friends and associates, while Radhakanta Dev, the editor of the celebrated Sanskrit lexicon, Shabdakalpadruma, was his formost conservative critic.

Henry Louis Vivian Derozio (1809-1831), an exceptionally talented young Anglo-Indian teacher of the Hindu College, who was also a poet, created a sensation by his ultra-radical thought which attracted a large number of students. Their group came to be known as 'Young Bengal' which published two organs, the Enquirer and the Bengali Jnananesvan. The group included Ramtanu Lahiri, Krishnamohan Banerji, Peary Chand Mitra and Radhanath Sikdar. The 'Young Bengal' waged a revolt against the attitude of conformity in society and against ignorance and prejudices. Derozio was also the first Indian English poet of considerable importance; his output was slender but his sonnets, satirical verses and narrative poems were rich in imagery and diction. Then there was Krishnamohan Banerjee, author of the play The Peresecuted (1832), who would be remembered as the first playright in Indian English literature. In the 1840s Sashichandra Dutt wrote stories in English under the pseudonym, J.A.G. Barton.

Others who wrote in English were Kasiprasad Ghose, the poet, who also published the Hindu Intelligence (1846-57), and Michael Madhusudan Dutta, author of The Captive Ladie (1848). Another poet, who was also a moderate reformer, was Iswarchandra Gupta (1812-1859). He had a flair for satire and his Sambad Prabhakar became the first Bengali daily. (1839).

After Roy's death his mantle fell on Rabindranath's father, Debendranath Tagore (1817-1905). He founded the Tattvabodhini Sabha in 1839, and with Tattvabodhini Patrika, which had a high seriousness and moral message, he deeply influenced the intellectual life in the middle of the century. He also resuscitated the moribund Brahmo Samaj.

A towering figure of the period was Iswarchandra Vidyasagar (1820-1891). A man of great magnanimity, a profound scholar who made an outstanding contribution to Bengali language and literature, a dedicated social reformer, he became a legend in his own life time. Associates of Vidyasagar included Madanmohan Tarkalamkar (1817-1858) and Kaliprasanna Sinha (1840-1870), both of whom took great interest in the spread of literacy and education.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

There were a host of luminaries in the nineteenth century Bengali literature. Owing to the Renaissance this literature burst into a new dawn of modernism, as in the surging confluence of variegated personalities it could easily find a new dimension. Rammohun had already laid the foundation stone of Bengali prose; Iswarchandra Vidyasagar chiselled it. He was the first artist in Bengali prose, although he wrote few original books. Apart from his translations of Sanskrit classics into Bengali such as Vetal Panchvimsati (1847), Shakuntala (1854) based on Kalidas, Sitar vanavas (1860), an adaptation of Bhavabhuti's Uttar Ramcharit and part of Valmiki's Ramayana, he wrote some pieces of humorous prose like Ati alpo hailo and Aabar ati alpo hailo. Among his other original works Prabhavali Sambhason and Vidyasagar charit (unfinished are worth mentioning. Both Rammohun Roy and Vidyasagar were, indeed, the manifest image of the Renaissance. Humanists and intellectuals of the age, they both advocated the resurrection of the ancient tradition and the spread of western education.

A British Indian Association was formed in 1851 to further the interest of the Indians. Harish Chandra Mukherji (1824-1861) edited its organ, Hindu Patriot. He wrote for the indigo (neel) agitation during (1859-1860) and became a representative of the Bengali identity.

During the middle phase of the Renaissance (1857-1885) the contact with western culture brought a tremendous intellectual development in its wake. The young Bengal of the 1850s was described by Sri Aurobindo as 'a society electric with thought and loaded to the brim with passion'. Modernity was in the air, scholarship flourished. Art and literature flowered. It was, indeed, a period of 'a magnificent outburst of creative activity' and Bengal was naturally proud of her own language.

Michael Madhusudan Dutt (1824-1873) had embraced Christianity in 1843 and opted for a bohemian life, but he was second to none in his love for Bengali literature. His first drama, Sarmistha created a sensation by breaking away from classical conventions. He introduced the sonnet and the blank verse in Bengali and in 1861 published his magnum opus, Meghanadvadh-kavya, in blank verse, which made him famous overnight. His outlook was thoroughly unorthodox and he sympathised more with Ravana than with Rama. No wonder he came to be acclaimed as a rebel poet. His other works include sonnets, lyrics, one act plays and historical tragedies, each first of its kind in Bengali literature.

Dinabandhu Mitra (1828-1873) started with writing minor poetry but became a major writer when he turned to drama. His masterpiece, Nil darpan (1860), is an intensely powerful drama of social protest and written at the peak of the indigenous indigo agitation. Bankimchandra Chatterji (1838-1894), the greatest of the literary giants of the time, was the father of the Indian novel and a master of Bengali prose. He was probably inspired by Walter Scott when he wrote his first historical romance, Durgesh Nandini (1865), but his individual talent was of an exceptionally of high order. Anandamath (1882) contained the soul-stirring lyric, 'Vande mataram'. Chatterji was also a great thinker and wrote light and serious essays, mostly for the monthly Bangadarshan, founded and edited by him. He combined orthodoxy and modernity into a fine synthesis.

The poets of the period included Rangalal Banerjee (1827-1909), Hemchandra Banerjee (1838-1903) and Navinchandra Sen (1847-1900). Dwarkanath Vidyabbhusan (1820-1886) founded the fearless weekly, Somaprakash. Rajendralal Mitra (1822-1891) was well-known for his historical research, and Mahendralal Sarkar (1833-1904) founded in 1876 the Indian Association for the Cultivation of Science. During this middle phase, religious and social reforms of Keshabchandra Sen (1838-1884) revitalized the Brahmo Samaj with radical thoughts. Among his disciples was the well-known scholar Sivanath Sastri (1847-1919).

The God-intoxicated Ramakrishna Parmahamsa (1836-1886) was a phenomenon by himself. He believed there were as many ways to God as there were ideologies and preached detached dutifulness. The Hindu nationalists of the post-1857 Mutiny found their leader in Rajnarayan Bose (1826-1899), an organiser of the annual Mela from 1867, with an able ally in the essayist and novelist Bhudev Mukherji (1827-1894). Following Rajnarayan, Surendranath Banerjee (1848-1925), editor of The Bengalee, became the 'Uncrowned King' of Bengal. The great national resurgence during 1885-1905 led to self-confidence in India's spiritual power, and dedicated service to people taught by Swami Vivekananda (1863-1902). The Renaissance in Bengal found its fullest fruition in Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941). Even as a boy, Rabindranath had attracted attention with his patriotic poems at the Hindu Mela in 1875 and 1877, and in 1892 he pleaded for the introduction of Bengali as the medium of instruction for higher education. In 1901 he founded the Santiniketan School, now Visva Bharati, and by 1905 came to be regarded not only as the greatest writer in modern India but also the most representative Indian .

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The British announced the Partition of Bengal in 1905. The Swadeshi movement was now in full swing and the patriotic songs of Tagore, Rajanikanta Sen, Mukunda Das and others filled the air as did the fiery speeches of orators like Bipinchandra Pal (1858-1932). Prafulla Chandra Roy (1861-1944) established the Bengal Chemical. With the munificence of Subodhchandra Mallik and others the National Council of Education was set up on 11 March 1906.

There were extermists who assembled round the central figure of Brahmabandhav Upadhyay (1861-1907), who waged a relentless crusade against the British through his daily Sandhya. Aurobindo Ghosh (later Sri Aurobindo, 1872-1950), editor of Bande mataram, made a revolutionary meteoric appearance at this time. Nationalism, he said, was a divine religion.

The foundations of modern Bengali literature and culture were thus laid during the Renaissance in Bengal, the impact of which was felt throughout the country.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Gupta (ed.), Studies in the Bengal Renaissance (Calcutta, 1958); A. Poddar, Renaissance in Bengal (Simla); A. Sen, Notes on the Bengal Renaissance (2nd ed., Calcutta, 1957).

V.C.
Bi.C.

RENAISSANCE (Dogri). The year 1944, when Dogri Sanstha, Jammu, was established, marks the beginning of renaissance in Dogri. Dogri had received patronage in the courts of Dogra rajas in the last century, and Maharaja Ranbir Singh of Jammu (1856-1885) took special interest in reforming the Dogri script, publication of books in the reformed script and prescription of a text book in Dogri for the officials of his government. However, after his death, Urdu became the official language and medium of instruction, and Dogri was relegated to neglect to the extent that people developed an inferiority complex about their mother-tongue and Dogri came to be considered not fit enough for any writing or even civilised discourse. Dogri Sanstha, the literary and cultural organisation formed by a few intellectuals of Jammu, set before itself the following objectives: Development of Dogri language; building up Dogri literature embodying all aspects of Dogra life; research into the history of Dogra community and its publication; forging links among the various sections of Dogra community separated by different geographical divisions and to secure for them a place of respect among other Indian communities.

The movement led by Dogri Sanstha, Jammu, has been greatly responsible for spawning of several similar organisations at different centres of Duggar, creation of a corpus of Dogri literature, creation of Dogri sections in College magazines in Dogri speaking areas, introduction of proficiency examinations like Tilak and Shastri, introduction of Dogri as an elective subject in higher secondary schools in Dogri speaking areas, establishment of the Postgraduate department of Dogri in Jammu University and a Dogri Research Centre, extension of patronage to Dogri language and literature by the J&K Academy of Art, Culture and Language and recognition of the language by the Sahitya Akademi. All these measures have given a big boost to the production of more and more literature in Dogri.

Sh.

RENAISSANCE (Gujarati) was the outcome of the western impact on Indian society. The British Raj brought new administrative and educational systems. The influence of these reforms was far-reaching. In 1820 'The Bombay Educational Society' was set up and text-books were published. In 1825 'The Native Education Society' prepared text-books in Gujarati. It was Sir John Malcolm's conviction that the public education should be given in vernacular, and as a result new schools came up in Surat, Ahmedabad, Bharoch, Kheda, Dholka and Nadiad. In Surat, Durgaram Mehta started 'Manav Dharma Sabha' to bring about social reforms. A. Kinlock Forbes took keen interest in Gujarati folk-tales and founded the 'Gujarati Vernacular Society' in 1848. The reformists like Ranchhodbhai Girdharbhai, Karsandas Mulji, Jhaverilal Umiyashankar, Karsandas Madhavdas, Tribhuvandas Dwarkadas and Mahipatram worked actively under the banner of 'Buddhivardhak Hindu Sabha'. And in 1854, three Universities came into existence at Bombay, Madras and Calcutta.

A new interest in learning arose in Gujarati. Under the influence of the British educational system, the young generation for the first time came into contact with the west, especially with the English culture which emphasized the values of individual freedom and equality. All these factors contributed to transition from the medieval to the modern world.

There was now a significant revival in art and letters. Higher education awakened the people's interest in English literature, while stress on the classical language brought about a renewal of interest in ancient Sanskrit works. An opening to the Western literary genres led to the expansion of our own literature. In literature the consequences of these changes were many: religious content was discarded; didacticism was reduced; individual subjectivity gained respect; prose was introduced as a literary medium; distinction between poetry and versification became sharp. In short, in addition to new forms in poetry, Gujarati literature expanded into new genres of prose writing, such as novel, short story, essay, biography, autobiography and criticism.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Narmad was the pioneer of Gujarati renaissance, who, with his innovations and reformist zeal, not only changed the poetic course, but introduced various prose forms and worked as a compiler, biographer and lexicographer. Dalpatram, though a contemporary of Narmad, was moderate in his spirit and vigour. He acquired the modern sentiment but pursued an indigenous verse style. Balashankar Ullasram Kantharia adopted the poetic model of Hafiz and some other Persian poets and ushered in ghazals. Nandshankar Tuljashankar Mehta, betraying the influence of Walter Scott, wrote Karanghelo, the earliest historical novel in Gujarati. Navalram, editor of Shalapatra, gave a shaping hand to criticism. Ranchhodbhai Udayram, Ganpatram Rajaram, Mansukharam Suryaram, Ichchharam Suryaram, Harilal Dhruva, Behramji Mahervanji Malabari and others contributed to the renaissance in Gujarati literature. Besides, the Parsis also played a role in producing early renaissance literature.

C.T.

RENAISSANCE (Hindi). The process of change in Hindi from the old to the new, from the medieval to the modern, started in the first quarter of the 19th century. Western ideas started filtering in and people became familiar with new realities and values of life. By the end of the third quarter of the 19th century we find ourselves unmistakably at the threshold of modern life and literature. It was the dawn of the Indian Renaissance.

Many factors worked together to bring about this change. The expansion of British power and its consolidation after 1857 resulted in an unprecedented unification of the country. This sense of unity engendered nationalist thoughts which received further impetus from the western ideal of liberty. In 1857 the rule of the country passed from the East India Company to the Crown. The Royal Proclamation by Queen Victoria containing many assurances gave a new hope to the people. But soon famine, epidemics, taxes and unemployment disillusioned them and they began to feel that they should have a voice in the governance of their country. European nationalism made a deep impact on Indian life: likewise western pragmatism also influenced Indian thought. The introduction of English education, the opening of schools and colleges, the establishment of printing presses like the Calcutta Education Press (1824) and the publication of newspapers and periodicals greatly contributed to the new awakening in the country. Literature no longer belonged to the elite and feudal classes but began to reflect the hopes and aspirations, fears and frustrations of the nation at large.

Brahmo Samaj, Prarthana Samaj and Arya Samaj, and their great founders Raja Rammohun Roy, Govind Ranade and Swami Dayanand made valuable contribution towards the regeneration of Indian life in the 19th century.

The new awakening influenced the literature of the age. There was a distinct change in the content and form of poetry. The age in Hindi literature was described as the age of the Renaissance—also as 'Bharatendu Era' after Bharatendu Harishchandra, the most dominating personality of the period, who gathered around him a circle of writers writing under his guidance or inspiration. The Renaissance age in Hindi begins from 1808 with Bharatendu's monthly Kavivachana-sudha and extends up to 1990, the start of Saraswati.

The Renaissance in Hindi literature worked in two directions. One, the poets began to take pride in their heritage; two, they became conscious of new stirrings, new urges and new demands. For some time the vision tended to be blurred; even in Harishchandra there is a conflict between a feudal outlook and the new awakening, while a good many poets continued to write devotional poems and erotic verses in the tradition of the stylized poetry of the past.

It is true that the old traditions survived long in one form or the other, yet new tendencies began to manifest themselves. As the scope of life expanded, poetry was called upon to handle new themes. Every aspect of life—political, social, cultural and economic—became the concern of the poets now. On the one hand impressed, by peace and material progress that came to the country with the rule of Queen Victoria, they wrote benedictory verses in her honour, on the other they wrote about the general poverty of the masses, illiteracy and social injustice. What Gandhiji advocated many decades later was anticipated by the poets of the Bharatendu age. They came to realise that for economic stability the raw material of the country must not be drained out to foreign lands and that cottage industries needed be encouraged. Bharatendu in his poem 'Prabodhini' appealed to the people in plain language to boycott foreign goods.

The language of poetry which had become stylized for over half a century was renovated. Bharatendu imparted a new cadence to Brajbhasha. Moreover, he was one of the creators of Kharibodi poetry also which could meet the new demands effectively. In spite of being staunch supporters of Hindi, Bharatendu and his circle did not shun Urdu words. Bharatendu, Premghan and Pratapnarayan Mishra used words and idioms not only from Urdu but also from local dialects such as Kannauji, Bhojpuri, Bundeli and Avadhi. They avioded uncalled for adornment and hyperbolic expressions and followed the dictum: 'Try to be exact without being vulgar and be precise without being pedantic (Horace).'

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Another contribution by the poets of the Renaissance lies in the element of liveliness and freshness they brought to Hindi poetry. Bharatendu's contribution in this field is the greatest. Now only in the songs of his plays but also in his enigmatic verses (including parodies) there is abundance of humour and sarcasm.

The poets of the age did not fight shy of making new experiments in the field of poetic genres, diction and metre. They believed in trying new patterns. Though a large number of poems were witten in descriptive and matter-of-fact style, there are glimpses of romantic vision and free diction in poets like Jagmohan Sinha. In poetic genres too they made a few innovations and wrote lyrics and stray verses. Compositions in the style of folk-songs were equally popular. The 'kajaris' of Pratapnarayan Mishra and the 'lavnis' of Bharatendu, Radhacharan Goswami and Jaganmohan Sinha were very popular. Some of the poets employed the Urdu and Bengali metres as well. The use of blank verse in Ambika Datt Vyas's Kamsa-vadha was a refreshing experiment in poetry.

Bharatendu and his circle, known popularly as 'Bharatendu Mandal', made a significant contribution to the development of Hindi prose and drama also. Before Bharatendu there were hardly any standard Hindi prose works, except some sporadic works by such pioneers as Lalooji Lal, Sadal Mishra and Insha Allah. It was for the first time that the Hindi writers attempted to write original plays, novels, and essays with the clear intention of bringing about a cultural, social and political awakening.

Though Bharatendu and his associates wrote dramas on mythological, historical and romantic themes as well, one is specially impressed by the plays written on current problems both social and political. While Bharatendu's Bharat durdasha and Andher nagari, Balkrishna Bhatt's Nai roshani ka vish and Pratapnarayan Mishra's Kali kautuk depict the miserable plight of the people caused by social evils and colonial rule, there were plays like Vidhwa vivah, Dukhini bala, Buddha munh muhase which underlined the injustice and ill-treatment meted out to women in society. The satirical plays like Vediki hinsa hinsa na bhavati, Achar vidamban, Maha andher-nagari with their broad humour and pungent satire exposed the weaknesses of priesthood and the privileged classes. They offer diagnosis as well as treatment of the malaise that had set in society. Thus the plays of this period made the people conscious of the social evils, besides inspiring them to have faith in human values.

The media, specially the weeklies and monthlies, are the main source of public awakening, since they voice protest and resentment against tyranny and injustice. The Bhartendu era, because of limited printing facilities, was mainly an era of journals and periodicals, such as Harishchandra magazine, Brahman, Hindi pradip, Anand kadambini and Sadadarsha. All the prominent prose-writers of the age, such as Bharatendu, Balkrishna Bhatt, Pratapnarayan Mishra, Premghan and Sri Niwasdas were connected with these journals as editors. They not only enriched Hindi prose with their essays but educated and awakened the readers through their works. Their interests were varied, covering not only literature but also archaeology, history, religion, fine arts and biographies. Another notable contribution was in the form of essays and travelogues.

By writing on topics of current interest like widow-marriage, education of women, poverty, ill effects of fashion, relations between the ruler and the ruled, these writers tired to awake the conscience of the poeple, particularly the middle-class educated community. Their role in the cultural renaissance of the nation is perhaps even greater than that of the poets and the dramatists.

The changed vision of the writers, their new way of thinking and handling of new subjects, their use of a new medium in the form of Khariboli, the expansion of literary genres and fresh patterns of life, all point towards the dawn of Renaissance in the history of Hindi literature.

S.S.G.

RENAISSANCE (Kannada). From the second half of the seventeenth century, for nearly two hundred years, not much of real merit was written in Kannada. The renaissance in Kannada literature blossomed fully in the twenties of the present century, but the awakening began in the second half of the nineteenth century. Under the direct British rule of Old Mysore (1831-81) the state was firmly on the road to modernization. The first English-teaching school came up in 1883, and the first Government College in 1864. Similar changes were taking place in other parts of Karnataka also. The first newspaper in Kannada. Mangaluru bamachara, came out in 1843. By 1882 there were 600 primary schools in Bombay-Karnataka area.

The milieu was thus fast changing. Economic life and cultural climate, too, was changing. The visit of Sri Vivekananda to Mysore state and other parts of Karnataka, the extension of the work of the Theosophical Society and the Brahmo Samaj, and the close contact of Bombay Karnataka with the Bombay leaders, all served to awaken interest in Indian culture and history, just at the time when the Indian consciousness was being exposed powerfully to western influences. Chamaraja Wodayar, the ruler of Mysore, was a patron of fine arts, and encouraged the starting of a dramatic company practically in the palace.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

About the same time, translations began to appear–translations of both Sanskrit classics and English works. Bunyan's The Pilgrim's Progress was translated in 1857. Churamuri Seshagiri Rao translated Kalidasa's Shakuntala in 1870.

The new spirit manifested itself at three centres, Bangalore, Mysore and Dharwada. Muddan's Ramashwamedha (1898) is a work where the Old meets the New. The story is that of the repudiation of Sita by Rama, and the spirit of the narration is of the earlier poets. But in the frame of the dialogue between the poet and his wife, the new spirit asserts itself.

In Old Mysore B.M. Srikantia served as a focal point. In Bombay Karnataka, a group of young poets formed 'Geleyara Balaga'. D.R. Bendre and V.K. Gokak were among the members. In Dakshina Kannada, poets like Panje Mangeshwara Rao and M. Govinda Pai were pioneers.

The renaissance proper may be taken to stretch from 1920 to the early 'forties'. It was shaped by non-literary forces like the struggle for freedom, the resurgent pride in Hinduism and in India's history and culture, western education and industrial progress. The literary influences which shaped it were English literature, Sanskrit and classical Kannada literatures, and Kannada folk literature.

The renaissance came deeply under the influence of Shakespeare and the Romantic poets. Literature became secular and humanistic. The love of freedom and values like the dignity of man and the equality of all men were embedded in the age and its literature. There was keener interest in the variety and richness of human nature and oddities of human behaviour. Love of Nature and a feeling of kinship with Nature which was seen as the temple of an Immanent Spirit marked the poetry of the age. The lyric and its prose counterpart, the short story, attracted many of the best writers. Many forms such as sonnet, ode, elegy, short story, one-act play, novel and personal essay were taken over from English literature. Although tragedy was not altogether unknown to the Sanskrit stage, it came to Kannada literature from Greece through the English language. There were numerous experiments in metrical patterns. The forging of blank verse ('sarala ragale') was a great achievement. Poetry often came to be wedded to music, and lovely songs were composed by poets like P.T. Narasimhachar, V. Sitaramiah, K.V. Puttappa and Siddayya Puranika. In other forms, too, there were experiments. This was an age of experiments and innovations inspired by the study of English literature. There was greater awareness of the importance of 'form'. There was also serious consideration of the nature and impact of literature. The creative process came to be studied for the first time, and concepts like the Imagination were analysed. Prose came to be consciously cultivated, and the need to develop it to meet the demands of modern life and the expanding realm of knowledge came to be appreciated. Prose acquired flexibility and range, and this was a major achievement of the age.

Classical Sanskrit and Kannada literatures received attention in an age inspired by the resurgent national spirit and the work of western archaeologists and linguists and students of comparative religion and culture. This ensured the continuity of the literary tradition, despite the powerful impact of western culture and religion. Sanskrit works were translated and studied. The first generation of writers like Masti Venkatesha Iyengar and D.R. Bendre wrote on Kalidasa and Valmiki, and on Kannada poets like Kumaravyasa and Lakshmisha. In this age rich tributes were paid to earlier Kannada poets like Pampa, Ranna, and Kumaravyasa. The Vachana literature of the twelfth century was practically rediscovered and it inspired several critical studies.

Folk literature was another source of inspiration. For the first time folk songs were collected with care and academic discipline, and the culture embodied in these songs was studied. The joy of life and the spirit of endurance, and the recognition of man's place in the scheme of creation—all these elements which we find in folk literature influenced poets like Bendre, who also responded to the tunes and the lilt and the rhythm and diction of folk songs. Writers like Shivarama Karanth were deeply interested in folk art and culture.

Renaissnace literature had a more or less homogeneous readership; the writer was an educated member of the middle class, writing for middle class readers. The spirit was that of the educated liberal, humanistic and on the side of reformation, but not revolutionary. Quite a number of these writers came from a rural background, but their experience was limited to the socially upper class life. For about a quarter of a century the renaissance spirit was dominant. It was interested in the life here and now, had a zest for life and faith in progress, and was liberated from many of the prejudices which had shackled society for ages. It had nationalistic pride, but was also inspired by the vision of the brotherhood of all mankind. But the Second World War and the increasing impact of Marxism changed the world in which it had to survive. Around 1945 the renaissance spirit was weakened by the Progressive Movement. But in the quarter of a century when the renaissance spirit shaped literature, it helped Kannada literature enter the modern world, liberated the lyrical spirit, enriched it through its innovative advances, and its readiness to take over new forms from the West, and shaped Kannada prose, endowing it with range and flexibility.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

L.S.S.R.

RENAISSANCE (Kashmiri). Kashmiri literature awoke to new realities of the times in the first quarter of the current century. Till then it was confined to versification alone. The trend of literary journalism started in the early thirties. The first phase of renaissance in Kashmiri began with the publication of Vitasta by Prem Nath Bazaz from Srinagar in 1932. The then new wave poems by Ghulam Ahmad Mahjoor (1985-1952) and A.A. Azad (1903-1948) appeared in this journal. They were joined by Naz Kulgami later. The publication of Vitasta created a stir in the literary circles and gradually Kashmiri literature shook off the mystic tradition which had dominated it for a long time.

Another factor which contributed to the renaissance was the revival of theatre which had lost its ground in the 15th century with the death of Budshah (1420-1470). For feeding the stage, original dramas had to be written. Earlier, the Kashmiri drama was alive only in the shape of 'Badipathir', which is a form of Kashmiri folk-theatre. The first drama in Kashmiri, Satich kahvit (The touch-stone of truth) was written by Nandlal Kaul (1870-1940). The play is based on the story of Harishchandra and his devoted wife Taramati. This theme was handled by Tarachand Bismil (1904-1948) in his drama Satich vath (The path of truth, 1939). Both these dramas are akin to the dramas of Agha Hashr Kashmiri in style and diction. He wrote some more dramas, but only one of them has been published under the title Akanundun (1939).

Nilakanth Sharma (1888-1970) and Ghulam Nabi Dilsoz (1916-1941) wrote some long and short plays during this period. Dilsoz wrote farces like Shirin Khusrau, Lila Majnun and Kamal Ataturk which were published in small booklets and gained great popularity. During this period the credit for writing a full length drama depicting social realism goes to Mohi-ud-Din Hajini (b.1917). In his drama Gris sund gari (Peasant's house) he depicted the problems of peasants.

In this way it was drama which paved the way for furture prose writers and laid the foundation of prose writing in Kashmiri and created the urge for revival and renaissance among the educated youth.

It was also during this period that Mahjoor wrote his famous song:

Vwolo haa baagvana nav bharuk shan paada kar

(Come gardener, create the glory of spring)

This song is replete with the sentiment of nationalism, and it created a new trend, a new tradition in Kashmiri poetry. This was a departure from the past tradition and the content of poetry began to change. For the first time literature began to look at life objectively. In 1940, G.A. Mahjoor brought out the first Kashmiri weekly, Gash (light), from Srinagar. Though this weekly could not survive for long, its publication proved beyond any doubt that the Kashmiri language was powerful enough to become the language of journalism. The first phase of the renaissance of Kashmiri literature could not accelerate its pace and failed to gain momentum for want of encouragement from the government.

The year 1947 created an upheaval in the political and cultural atmosphere in the valley, but it proved to be a blessing in disguise, pivotal in the second and most powerful phase of cultural renaissance in Kashmir. The raid of tribals on Kashmir in 1947 shook the intellectuals, writers, artists and other patriotic forces who, at this hour of crisis, stood united under the banner of an organisation, 'Cultural Front', to defend their homeland from the onslaught of tribals from the north-west. The Cultural Front orgainsed by the leftist forces was, by and large, a training school of leftist ideology, but its contribution to the renaissance of Kashmiri culture in general, and literature in particular, was considerable. It started the first literary monthly, Kongposh (Saffron flower), which continued to be published from 1949 to 1956 with a long interval in between in 1953. Kongposh proved to be the harbinger of a new age in the history of Kashmiri language and literature. Through the pages of this journal, new genres of literature like free verse, blank verse, sonnet, short story, novel and literary criticism were introduced.

Prior to Kongposh, the Cultural Front published an anthology of poems, Gaey ja Kashmir. Poems included in this anthology were totally different in thought-content, form and expression. These poems are the poems of revolution and change. This anthology discovered the hero of the second phase of renaissance in the person of Dinanath Nadim (1916-1988), who dominated the scene for more than a decade. Even a seasoned poet like Mahjoor followed in the footsteps of Nadim and tried to emulate his style. Nadim, the hero of the renaissance, introduced new forms of free verse, blank verse, opera, sonnet, haiku and short story in Kashmiri literature. His powerful style, mastery of language, and fresh and invigorating ideas changed the course of Kashmiri prose and poetry. In fact, Nadim proved to be the tallest of the tall in the second phase. Following Nadim, many others joined the ranks of progressive writers, prominant among the new entrants being Noor Mohammad Roshan, Amin

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Kamil (b. 1924), Rehman Rahi (b. 1925) and Ghulam Rasool Santosh (b.1929). All the new entrants contributed their bit to enriching Kashmiri literature in the field of poetry, prose and drama.

Another factor which accelerated the pace for revival and renaissance of Kashmiri literature was the establishments of Radio Kashmir at Srinagar in 1949. The installation of the station opened new vistas and provided writers with an opportunity to develop the Kashmiri language and literature in accordance with the day to day needs and requirements of broadcasting. As a result, Radio plays, essays, scientific prose, skits, humorous plays and children's literature came into being.

In mid-fifties, the establishment of Lalla Rukha publications did a lot by collecting and publishing folk-songs and folk-tales under the guidence of Noor Mohammad Roshan.

In 1959, the State Cultural Academy was established. At the initial stages the Academy remained confined to organising Mushairas, etc., but after sometime it started the publication of a chain of journals in the important languages of the State, including Kashmiri. The organ of the Academy's bi-monthly, Shiraza, is the only journal which has been published regularly for the last 25 years. At present it is the biggest publishing house of Jammu and Kashmir. To infuse new blood in the literary movement, seminars, symposia, debates, mushairas and short story sittings are organised in the Kashmiri speaking areas. Whatever was achieved in the past in Kashmiri literature, is preserved for posterity by the Academy in the shape of publications.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Braj B.Kachru, Kashmiri literature (Wiesbaden, 1981); Chamanlal Chaman and Akhtar Bashir, Avhalnama (Srinagar, 1978); J.L. Kaul, Studies in Kashmiri (Srinagar, 1968); Naji Munawar and Shafi Shauq, Kashri adbuk tarikh (Srinagar, 1978).

Mo.S.

RENAISSANCE (Konkani) was the intellectual movement that took its name from the French word for re-birth. Originating in Italy of the 14th-16th centuries, it spread over Western Europe in the 16th century. "Among its outstanding characteristics was an emphasis on the potentialities of the individual and his life; the belief in the power of education to produce the 'complete man', the man of action who is also master of all the culture of his age; the desire to enlarge the bounds of learning; the growth of scepticism and free thought; and the acceptance of Greek and Latin literature and art as models." Its representative in Portugal, the western country under whose rule the Konkani homeland had just been drawn, was the epic and lyric poet Luis de Camoens (1525-1580) who, inter alia, wrote the epic Os Lusiadas (1572) recounting the history of Portugal and extolling the glorious deeds of their heroes over land and sea. Much of this epic was written by him on Goan soil while languishing in prison (after having served one Viceroy faithfully) for having dared to write blistering satires like 'Disparates da India' (Blunders of Portuguese India) and 'Sátira do Torneio' (Satire on the Tourney) on the misrule of Francisco Barreto, the then Viceroy of Portuguese India.

This ferment had spilled over into Goa, then at the height of its prosperity, resulting in the establishment of the printing press in 1556, the first in India, and leading to the study of Konkani and other Indian languages like Marathi, Tamil and comparative studies in these on Latin and Greek models. The urge to investigate into new areas of learning, especially in the realm of philology, came as an inspiration from Western scholarship, particularly from Greek and Latin through the concerned European languages modelled on them. These languages were employed as a yardstick to describe and evaluate the features of Konkani in a comparative manner and books were written on them, examining them in all their morphological, syntactical and phonological aspects, thus endowing Konkani with a strong grammatical base.

The first grammar in Konkani was composed by a Goan lay brother, said to be Andre Vaz of Carambolim village, before 1583, on the foundations of which was erected the impressive linguistic literature of grammarians like Henrique Henriques (1520-1600), Thomas Stephens (1549-1617), Joao de S. Matias (alive between 1595 and 1624), Gaspar de S.Miguel (alive between 1595 and 1647), Simao Alvares (alive between 1695 and 1744) and Karel Prikryl (1718-1785) and lexicographers like the Jesuits of Rachol (late sixteenth century), Diogo Ribeiro (1560-1633), Antonio de Saldanha (1598-1683), Miguel de Almeida (1610-1683) and Diogo de Amaral (1699-after-1762), revealing the great lexical wealth of Konkani in all its manifold versatility of expression.

On this basis of a relatively high literary standard, these and other missionaries created a prose literature in Konkani, introducing into Indian writing for the first time 'the sentence of classical Latin prose-with its traditional harmonious structure sharpened with the precision hammered into the Roman tongue by its Scholastic revolution—adorned with the luxuriance of Baroque imagery. Among the Indian languages, Sanskrit was the only language with an elaborately worked prose but, from the grammatical point of view, it has no grammatical complexities. Through Konkani a greater sophistication of sentence structure came into Indian prose for the first time in these literary compositions of the missionaries. The best speciman of it can be seen in Konkani's masterpiece of that period, Miguel de Almeida's On valleancho Mollo (Garden of shepherds), a prose-poem of sublime proportions published in 1658-59 in five printed volumes. Some of the outstanding literary works of that period are Life of St.Anthony by Antonio de Saldanha; Devachim ekangr bollnnim (1660), Konkani version of the great European classic Soliloquios Divinos of Bernardino Villegas, done by Joao de Pedrosa; Ignazio Arcamone's Sagllea Varsache vangel (1667), the first version of the Bible in any Indian tongue, summarising the Gospels of the New Testament; Arcamone's elaborate grammatical treatise on the Konkani and Deccani (Marathi) languages, the first comparative work of this type, laying the foundation for the science of comparative philology which evolved later; Gaspar de S. Miguel's works in prose and poetry and his formulation of the elaborate syntax of the language which he labels 'elegant' and 'polished'; and Frei Amador de Sant Anna's Flos Sanctorum (1607), in Kandevi script, a massive work on the lives of the saints, running into some 1070 pages of large format, now in the Bibliothéque National in Paris.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The second phase of the Renaissance in Konkani which has taken on added vigour during the last fifty years or so, began with the publication in 1858 of the famous Ensaio Historico da Lingua Concani (Historical survey of the Konkani language) by the Portuguese orientalist and Goa's Chief Secretary. J.H.da Cunha Rivara (1800-1879), which heralded the manifesto for Konkani's revival, setting out the literary heritage of the language and urging Goan youth and the community in general to dedicate themselves to the cultivation of this once ascendant, developed tongue. Very few sons of the soil were, however, impressed by the Chief Secretary's clarion call. The earliest was Eduardo Jose Bruno de Souza (1836-1905) who launched Konkani's first newspaper Udentechem sallok (Lotus of the east) in 1889 from Poona, one of the first of Konkani novels, Cristanv ghorabo (A Christian family), the first epic poem Eva ani Mori (Eve and Mary), and also did some grammatical work on it. Poet Fernando Leal (1846-1910) began in 1905 a crusade for the 'resurrection of Konkani' in which he grandiosely concluded that 'the resurrection of Konkani, like the resurgence of the old heroic song tradition of Konkani, will be more than just the resurrection of a language; it will be the resurrection of people, who thus, aided by the mysterious and ineluctable impulses of atavism, will again enter into the full possession of its ancient poetic, metaphysical and lyrical soul.' He was backed by Cristovao Pinto (1851-1926) who espoused the cause of Konkani schools with ardour, and R.P. Vaidya alias Dada Vaidya (1859-1947) who advocated its literary use, and earlier J. Gerson da Cunha (1844-1900) who had set out the independence of Konkani in his The Konkani Language and Literature (1881).

Outside Goa, the heart of the Konkani homeland, the emigrant communities settled in and around Mangalore came under the influence of Angelo Francesco Saverio Maffei (1844-1899), who had brought out his book, A Konkani Grammar (1882) and a dictionary of Konkani-English and vice-versa, and J.A. Saldanha (1869-1947) who went into the origin and growth of Konkani, and edited the Krista Purana, the Marathi-Konkani work of Thomas Stephens. The great Baptist Missionary, William Carey (1761-1834) translated the Bible into Konkani also, among other languages he chose for this task, under the title of Dharmalem pustak with the help of two Konkani pundits. Meanwhile, in St.Aloysius College at Mangalore and in their Kodialbail Press, the Jesuits gave fillip to research and publication in Konkani, giving the necessary assistance to publication of basic books and literary works in it. Luis Mascarenhas and Sardar Kanappa started a magazine Konkani Dirvem (Wealth) in 1912, giving great encouragement to literary work. It was followed by Raknno magazine of Sylvester Menezes who, inter alia wrote the Pashanvanchem git, a long poem, as Luis Mascarenhas had published Abravanchem Yadnadan, a long dramatic narrative poem. This movement has flowered in poets like C.F.D'Costa, J.B. Moraes, Luis Botelho, Cyril Sequeira, and short-story writers and novelists like J.S. Alvares and VJP Saldanha and others. like Sten Ageira and J.B. Sequeira.

From 1917 to 1942 Konkani received substantial support in the work of S.R. Dalgado (1855-1922), Professor of Sanskrit in Lisbon University, in terms of two massive dictionaries, Konkani-Portuguese (1893) and Portuguese-Konkani (1905), a collection of 2177 Konkani proverbs with explanations and comparisons with other Indian and foreign languages, of which he knew many, and a Luso-Asiatic Glossary (1921); Jules Bloch's (1880-1953) La formation de la langue Marathe (1920); S.M. Katre's The formation of Konkani (1942); V.P. Chavan's Konkani and the Konkan Language (1924) and the most powerful of them all in impacts, Vaman R.Varde Valaulikar alias Shenoy Goembab's (1877-1946) Grammatical Structure of Konkani (1949) comparing and contrasting several languages vis-a-vis Konkani, and distinguishing it from Marathi on substantial grounds. Valaulikar's historical and polemical works and literary compositions in the realm of the short story, drama and children's literature are commendable. He came out with some startling discoveries, such as the Rashtrakuta emperors were of Goan origin and so were their vassals, the Goan Shilaharas, genuine Kshatriya kings; the Apostle Purna who spread Buddhism in the south of India and Sri Lanka, was a Goan merchant—all this based on solid evidence.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

His colleague in this renaissance was another important figure, J.A. Fernandes, a grammarian and prose-writer known for his masterpiece, Amcho Soddvonddar (Our Redeemer). In Karwar, M.M. Shanbhag launched the Konkani Bhasha Mandal to revive the Konkani movement, which began the Konkani Parishads to weld together the dispersed Konkani communities in Karnataka, Kerala, Goa and Maharashtra in social and intellectual terms. Konkani writers and intellectuals, who had sought greener pastures elsewhere, came home to roost, discovering their true identity, and began writing in their mothertongue, men like B.B. Borkar, Dinkar Dessai and M.Govinda Pai. A new and flourishing era began with poets like R.V. Pandit, Manohar Sardessai, Pandurang Bhangi blazing new trails, followed by Uday Bhembro, Pundalik Naik, Olivinho Gomes, Nagesh Karmali, Jess Fernandes, Ramesh Veluskar, Madhav Borkar, Yusuf Shaik, and short story flowering with Shennoy Goembab, Chandrakant Keni, Meena Kakodkar, Damodar Mauzo, Olivinho Gomes, Pundalik Naik, Suresh Kakodkar, A.N. Mhambro, Jayanti Naik and others. Purushottam Mallya in Kerala and Yeshwant Palekar in Karwar were in the forefront of this movement, with Ravindra Kelekar shining in the essay and Antonio Pereira in the biography, among other genres. Drama has flourished with Pundalik Naik, Tomazinho Cardozo, Ashok Kamat, John Claro Fernandes, Dilip Borkar, N.Shivdas and others, and the novel too is making important strides. The discovery of the 16th century Mahabharata and Ramayana manuscripts and their publication in part by Lourdino Rodrigues, and the discovery and reconstruction of other old classics being done by Olivinho Gomes, should be a great booster for the ongoing renaissance for the vitality and versatility of the vocabulary they contain to serve present needs.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E.M. Horsley (ed.), Hutchinson's New 20th Century Encyclopaedia (London, 1964); Jose Pereira, Konkani - A Language (Dharwar, 1971); Olivinho Gomes, Konkani Sorospoticho Itihas ek supul'lo niall (Goa, 1989).

O.G.

RENAISSANCE (Maithili). The advent of western influence on Maithili literature heralded a new age in Maithili literature at the beginning of the twentieth century. The historical background of this new age started with the establishment of the British rule on the termination of the Indian Mutiny in 1858. From almost 1860 to 1880 the modernization of Mithila began. 'English' education was introduced and an attempt was made to replace the age-old system of 'Sanskrit' education. Of course, there was for a number of years a stiff opposition to the new system of education, but gradually it replaced the old system. Meanwhile, communications were improved, statistics and surveys were made, telegraph and railway lines were laid and administrative changes of fundamental character were effected. More important than these steps was the 'discovery' of Maithili language and literature by Sir George Grierson around 1880.

The native ruler of the land, who had been reduced to the status of a landlord but was still called the 'Maharaja of Tirhoot', exercised an important influence on the cultural and social set up of Mithila. He encouraged 'English' education, established a socio-cultural organization called the Maithil Mahasabha in 1910 and became the harbinger of a resurgent Mithila.

The renaissance among the Maithili speaking people had four centres of activity: (1) Varanasi, (2) Darbhanga, (3) Jaipur and Mathura, and (4) Calcutta. At Varanasi it centred round Mahamahopadhyaya Muralidhar Jha who started a monthly magazine in 1906, called Mithilamoda, which virtually gave birth to a large number of creative writers. At Darbhanga a Mithila research society, called 'Murda club' (a club for the study of dead bodies, i.e. ancient and medieval texts), was set up. The society published a monthly magazine, significantly called Mithila mihir (The sun of Mithila), in 1909. It later turned into a weekly and has since been serving the Maithili language. Another monthly, Mithila mitra, was started later by other enthusiasts. Mathura and Jaipur were also centres of literary magazines, the most important of them being Maithila hita sadhan (1905). In Bengal Sir Ashutosh Mukherji, Vice-chancellor of Calcutta University, set up two chairs for Maithil studies in 1917. Besides, such organizations as the Mithila Sangha and Mithila Sanskrit Parishad too, worked for the renaissance in Maithili literature.

The cumulative result of these activities was widespread awakening. The love of mother-tongue, pride in ancient and medieval literature, growth of a spirit of freedom and inquiry were the gifts of the new influence. Practical humanism, dedicated service to the native language, re-orientation of old conventions and values, and search for new forms and techniques of expression were the outcome now.

Above all, the printing press revolutionized everything. Unfortunately the printing of Maithili works in its own scripts, Tirhuta and Kaithi, was ignored. The adoption of Devanagari as the script for literature in Maithili had its own advantages and disadvantages. It made Maithili distinct from Bengali, under which its poets like Vidyapati and Govindadas were included till then, but it also gave an impression that it was akin to Hindi.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The immediate result of the new influence was the rise of journalism and the unprecedented growth of prose in its various forms hitherto unknown. Another difference that came with the new influence was a sense of dignity attached to the vernacular and its literature. Earlier, the vernacular was considered a vehicle fit for recreation—for producing at best 'Sukumar sahitya' (belles lettres). Indeed, literature itself was regarded as light reading, while the proper subjects of study were philosophy (especially Nyaya and Mimamsa), Dharmashastra, Vyakarana, astronomy, etc. The new system of education now changed the attitude of the people who began to feel that literature in vernacular deserved a far more serious attention. However, the higher classes in Mithila resisted for long the new influence and boycotted the English education. And when they accepted it, they found that their mother-tongue had no place in the scheme of new education. While the University of Calcutta did recognize Maithili as a modern Indian literature, the Universities of Patna, Bihar and Darbhanga gave hardly any importance to it. It was as late as 1937 when Maithili was recognized as a subject of study in the high schools, and it was only in 1990 that it became the medium of instruction and examination.

The renaissance, therefore, was limited in Maithili literature to the induction of new forms and techniques on a small scale. It was only in the wake of Independence in 1947 that the English educated writers gave Maithili the fruits of the Renaissance. Of course, in this struggle between the old and the new, Maithili literature had the advantage of retaining some of its ancient scholarship and old-world grace.

J.M.

RENAISSANCE (Malayalam). The closing years of the nineteenth century and the first few decades of the twentieth formed a period of transition in the social and cultural history of Kerala. This transition was naturally reflected in its literature too, which registered an all-round growth, resulting in what is known as literary renaissance.

The period started with a concerted effort to re-create the national tradition in literature in a new mould. The values inherited from ancient Indian culture, the inspiration drawn from Sanskrit poets like Vyasa, Valmiki and Kalidasa, and the consequent nationalistic ideals were behind this literary revival. At the same time, it represented a re-assertion of the identity of the regional heritage of Malayalam literature as well as that of its socio-cultural background. The new literary movements revealed a change in the form of a growing preference for the indigenous vocabulary and style, a return to native metres and an effort to revive the folk tradition, while a renewed pride in the natural beauty of Kerala, a strong sense of local patriotism and an awareness of the realities of social life provided their content. There was also a quest for, and an effort to evolve, new concepts and ideals which gradually led to the emergence of new literary models based on liberal ideas, scientific thinking and social philosophy.

The initial mission undertaken by poets like Kerala Varma (1845-1914), A.R. Rajaraja Varma (1863-1918), Kunjikkuttan Tampuran (1864-1913), Ulloor Parameshwara Iyer (1877-1949) and Vallattol Narayana Menon (1878-1958) to resurrect the creative genius of Sanskrit literature through translations and adaptations set in motion a chain of similar endeavours. Tampuran translated the entire Mahabharata, Vallattol the whole of Valmiki Ramayana and the plays of Bhasa, Kerala Varma Kalidasa's Shakuntala, and Rajaraja Varma a number of Kalidasa's works. This was followed by some original works of the same poets such as those of Vallattol which re-created numerous characters of the epics and the puranas, or those of Ulloor which extolled the ideals of ancient India. Side by side, Rajaraja Varma's effort to resurrect the romantic spirit inherent in Sanskrit poetry was carried forward by poets like V.C. Balakrishna Panicker (1889-1915), Kumaran Asan (1873-1924), Ulloor and Vallattol, some of whom were influenced by European romanticism also.

Vallattol, a patron of indigenous art forms such as Kathakali and Mohiniyattam, and most of his contemporaries wrote, especially their later poems, in native metres. Similarly, it was not an accident that Vallattol's glorification of patriotism, Kerala's natural beauty and the nation's cultural heritage reverberated in the poems of his successors like G. Sankara Kurup (1901-1978), P. Kunjiraman Nair (b.1905) and Changampuzha Krishna Pillai (1913-1947).

Another significant development related to novel and drama. Themes associated with Kerala's heroic past were handled with popular appeal. The great historical novels of C.V. Raman Pillai (1858-1922), such as Marthanda Varma, Dharmaraja and Ramaraja Bahadur, and those of K.M. Panikker (1894-1963) are worthy of special mention.

Quite naturally, there was a parallel search for a new approach to life evolving new ideas and a new means of expression. This resulted, on the one hand, in the rapid spread of liberal ideas, scientific thinking and evolution of democratic ideals, strengthened and sustained by the exposure of the educated to western culture and literature. On the other hand, the awakening of the social psyche led to a series of reforms and to an incessant clamour for more substantial changes. The impact of such factors on

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Malayalam literature was far reaching. In the first place, writing in prose commenced in a big way and, in course of time, established itself as the major branch of literature. Prose developed into the common man's medium of expression and made literature accessible to him. This also led to the adoption of western forms like the novel, short story, prose play, and biography.

Kumaran Asan consolidated the romantic approach, depicted human life in the light of liberal ideas and an idealistic philosophy, and strongly advocated the eradication of inequalities. Vallattol adopted a nationalistic outlook and wrote in support of the struggle for freedom, while C.V. Raman Pillai popularized the historical novel. Chandu Menon (1847-1889), who championed the modernization of society, laid the foundation of the novel by writing Indulekha and Sarada. The age of prose drama was inaugurated by C.V. and carried forward by E.V. Krishna Pillai (1894-1938). The short story too had its beginnings at the same time, thanks to the contributions of K. Sukumaran and M.R.K.C. (1882-1940).

Apart from all these, the literary developments of this period had two important features which justify the concept of renaissance. First, literature became diversified, its horizon expanded and the number of authors increased; new writers started entering the field regularly and through their efforts new movements and forms began to appear. Secondly, literature became closely associated with new ideological approaches, playing an active role in the transformation of society.

The new climate became pronounced in the third decade of the twentieth century with the advent of a large number of younger poets, writers and playwrights like G. Sankara Kurup, Balamani Amma, Changampuzha Krishna Pillai, Edappalli Raghavan Pillai, Vyloppillil Sreedhara Menon, P. Kunjiraman Nair, N.V. Krishna Warrior, Idasseri Govindan Nair, Olappamanna Subrahmanian Nambudiri, Akkitham Achuthan Nambudiri, P. Bhaskaran, Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai, Karur Nilakantha Pillai, Muhammed Bashir, S.K. Pottekkatt, T. Padmanabhan, P.C. Kuttikrishnan ('Uroob'), M.T. Vasudevan Nair, the Kainikkara brothers, N. Krishna Pillai, Pulimana Parameswaran Pillai, V.T. Bhattathiripad, C.J. Thomas, C.N. Sreekanthan Nair, Thoppil Bhasi, K.T. Muhammed, and many others. Their contribution enriched the romantic movement, diversified it, ushered in due course an era of realism and introduced forms like symbolism, poetic drama and expressionism. The short story and the novel reached remarkable heights resulting in the production of quite a few works which have been widely acclaimed as models of contemporary Indian literature. Such unprecedented progress in creative literature, was partly the result of the critical evaluation and judicious guidance offered by critics like A.R. Rajaraja Varma, A. Balakrishna Pillai, Kuttkrishna Marar, Joseph Mudasseri and M.P. Paul.

Another important fact connected with the literary awakening is that it has led to the appearance of a new generation of poets, fiction-writers, playwrights, critics, etc. who have been experimenting with several new forms with a view to evolving a multi-faceted modern literature with its roots in the native tradition of Kerala.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G. Sankara Pillai, Malayala nataka sahitya charitram (Sahitya Akademi, Trichur); K.M. Tharakan, Malayala novel sahitya charitram (Sahitya Akademi, Trichur); M. Leelavathy, Malayala kavita sahitya charitram (Sahitya Akademi, Trichur); N. Krishna Pillai, Kairaliyute katha (Kottayam).

K.S.N.P.

RENAISSANCE (Manipuri) came to Manipuri literature quite late. The British conquest of Manipur in 1891 brought about several changes—social, political, educational and cultural. The period from 1891 to 1944 during which Maharaja Churachand Singh was king of Manipur may be broadly taken as the period of renaissance in Manipuri. In 1885 Johnstone Middle English School was established in Imphal which was the first such school in the state. In subsequent years several other educational institutions came up in Manipur, providing avenues for studies to the local people. The introduction of several new measures by the British in the wake of their conquest of Manipur, extension of postal, telegraphic, electrical facilities and other modes and means of communication quickened the pace of expansion of the mental horizon of the people who had remained for years almost insular. Manipuri was allowed for the first time in 1926 as a vernacular paper in the matriculation examination of Calcutta University which encouraged many writers to write in the language subsequently. The Manipuris who had been so long educated through the Bengali medium saw new prospects for their mother tongue, Manipuri, from now onwards. Many writers came forward to write in Manipuri and their writings brought about a radical change in Manipuri literature. Dr. Kamal Singh (1899-1935), Kh. Chaoba Singh (1896-1949), A. Minaketan Singh (1906), H. Nabadwipchandra Singh, (1897-1946), A. Dorendrajit Singh (1907-1944) and a host of other writers who wrote in the Manipuri language on different literary genres. Their writings had a tremendous impact in the language and for a time Manipur almost became a nest of singing birds. These writers showed the path, and revealed by their writings the richness of Manipuri. Several literary journals published in the thirties and forties of the century like the Yakairol, The Lalit Manjari

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Patrika, The Jyoti, the Ngasi, etc. gave ample avenue to those who wanted to write and exchange ideas with others. This revolution in the intellectual realm enabled the Manipuris to grasp the momentous changes taking place in society also. They became politically very conscious and socially aware of the evils prevalent during the time. Such political and social leaders like H. Irabot Singh (1896-1951) revolted against the dictatorial regime of the king and the many social evils perpetuated by a decadent society. Their writings and speeches awakened the people, and the Manipuris gradually tasted the fruit of freedom of speech and expression which ultimately helped them organise themselves into regular political parties. During this period there was a tremendous progress in cultural activity also. Manipuri culture, particularly the Manipuri dance, became famous and well-known. During the period the mental horizon of the Manipuris widened and they felt inspired to aim higher and scale new heights hitherto unattempted. The result was a new outlook, shaped by the spirit of renaissance in Manipuri.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Baasi, Krishnachuragi Angangba; N. Tombi Singh, Manipuri Sahityada Anouba Mityeng Ama, (Imphal, 1985); Mapal (Imphal. 1977).

I.R.B.S.

RENAISSANCE (Oriya). As a result of the British rule and the introduction of English education in Orissa, a new literature, different both in form and in content, emerged during the last century. This new trend, of course, took place imperceptibly and gradually, and took about a century to gain ground. It roused a new spirit of awareness and discarded the out-dated traditional poetic forms, borrowing new literary forms from the west. Hence, this period may be called the renaissance in Oriya literature.

This period may be divided into two phases. The first phase is the period of preparation for the renaissance. It begins from 1803, when Orissa was conquered by the British, and goes up to 1853 when the first High English Schools were set up at Puri and Balasore. This was the age of Christian missionaries who during this period translated the New Testament into Oriya, established primary schools and, for the first time, prepared text books and published a dictionary in Oriya. It is also they who first established a printing press at Cuttack in 1837 and brought out in 1849 the first journal in Oriya.

The introduction of English education in Orissa in the beginning did not receive due encouragement from the people. Because of maladministration in the early part of the British regime, people were apathetic to the foreign rule and the new system of education introduced by them. But gradually this attitude changed and the fruits of English education reached the people.

The second phase sees the spread of English education, and continues till 1903. In 1903, Utkal Sammilani,an important organisation, was set up by Madhusudan Das (1848-1934) to work for the formation of a separate province for Oriya-speaking people. This brought about an unprecedented enthusiasm and unity among the people of Orissa. Prior to this, the great famine of 1865-66 known as 'Na-anka' had made the people conscious of their condition under the British rule and roused in them a sense of unity and a desire for progress in different directions. This was a period of great significance—a period of transition, bidding farewell to the past and welcoming the new age.

Emergence of a new literature was possible mostly due to the rise of periodicals in different parts of Orissa, edited enthusistically by eminent men. The names of Utkal deepika edited by Gouri Shankar Ray (Cuttack, 1866), Balasore sambad bahika edited by Govinda Chandra Pattanayak (Balasore, 1861), Utkal heiteisini or Orissa patriot edited by B. Pandit (Cuttack, 1871), Utkal darpan patronised by Baikunthanath De (Balasore 1873), Utkal putra edited by P.M. Acharya (Cuttack, 1873), Nabasambad edited by B.N. Basu (Balasore, 1877), Sambalpur hiteisini edited by N.M. Bidyaratna (Bamra, 1889), Utkal prabha edited by Chaitanya Prasad Roy (Mourbhanj, 1891) and Utkal sahitya edited by V. Kar (Cuttack, 1897) deserve special mention in this context.

During this period Mahima and Bramho cults, which laid stress on one Supreme Lord instead of idol worship, had their roots in Orissa. Bhima Bhoi the Mahima saint–poet sang in one of his devotional songs:

> The unending misery and suffering of humanity
> Who can bear to see;
> Let me be in hell, let mankind
> Be liberated from sorrow.

This love of humanity also found expression in the writings of several other writers of this period.

The rich ancient literature of Orissa was preserved in palm leaf manuscripts and was not within the reach of the people. But for the printing press this treasure of rich heritage would not have come to light. The National Congress, struggling for national unity, inspired the masses. There was also an upsurge of social reform and people took up the cause of female education, widow marriage, abolition of child marriage, etc. The clash between the old values and the new ideas resulted in a controversy that provoked the publication of two journals, though short-lived, namely Indradhanu and Bijuli.

Radhanath Ray (1848-1908), Madhusudan Rao (1853-1912) and Fakirmohan Senapati (1843-1918) were the pioneers who tried to bring about a new era in Oriya literature. They introduced new literary forms and new ideas. Radhanath freed Oriya poetry from the bondage of ornate language and conventional devices and introduced new themes, particularly the idea of patriotism, inspired by the history of ancient Orissa. Madhusudan, father of modern lyrics, introduced new lyrical forms, such as elegy and sonnets, and created a new tradition. Through them, he voiced the spirit of the age: free thinking, liberty and humanitarianism.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Fakirmohan for the first time in Oriya literature wrote novels and short stories. He depicted the oppression of the people, advocated the spread of education among the women, and dealt with several problems of the then society. Ram Shankar Ray (1858-1937) took the lead in writing dramas. Besides, Madhusudan Rao, Viswanath Kar (1864-1934), Gopal Praharaj (1872-1945), Sashi Bhusan Ray (1874-1954) etc. introduced the new prose style through their essays on various topics.

Thus through the writings of these authors who were the architects of the renaissance in Oriya, the modern age in Oriya literature was ushered in. Also, poets like Gangadhar Meher (1862-1924) and Nand Kisore Bal (1875-1928) wrote powerful new poetry and contributed substantially to the renaissance.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.B. Mohanty, Adhunik Oriya sahitya (Cuttack, 1970); An approach to Oriya literature (Bhubaneswar, 1989).

J.B.M.

RENAISSANCE (Punjabi). With the establishment of the British supremacy over the whole of India in 1857, the political unity of the country was achieved. There was an impact of modern European civilisation and culture. The spread of English education brought the Indian mind into contact with western science and literature. As a consequence, there was a great intellectual expansion similar to the Renaissance in European countries in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. In the light of the new knowledge, there was a new awakening not only in religion, but also in various other domains including education, literature, art and science.

Alongwith the new awakening, the Christian missions started their crusade against the Indian religions. This threat served to rouse the Indian religious communities from their sleep. In order to assert their great and glorious past, several reformers, saints and scholars came forward. The Arya Samaj Movement safeguarded Hinduism and the Singh Sabha Movement safeguarded Sikhism in Punjab. Besides being religious movements, they were also reformist movements and worked for the country's cultural and political renaissance. Whereas the Christian missionaries prepared the Punjabi grammar and lexicons for the propagation of their faith, the Sikh scholars, who had their heritage in Punjabi language, broke new grounds in various forms of literature, under the impact of English literature.

With Bhai Vir Singh began the modern era in Punjabi literature. He interpreted the Sikh ideals for the first time in various forms of literature. He wrote short lyrics and thereby paved the way for the new literary trend in the domain of Punjabi poetry. He also wrote the first epic, Rana Surat Singh, in blank verse. He made first experiments in the field of novel, drama and modern prose. He is, in short, the father of modern Punjabi literature.

The romantic movement in Punjabi poetry began with Puran Singh. He discarded the use of metre and introduced free verse (vers libre) in Punjabi poetry. He was an idealist, but Dhani Ram Chatrik, the next significant poet, was a realist. He depicted the life of the common people and sang of Punjab and its culture. Lala Kirpa Sagar wrote his long epic Lakshmi Devi in doha metre and based it on The Lady of the Lake by Walter Scott.

After Bhai Vir Singh, the prose was enriched by Shardha Ram Phillauri, Puran Singh, Teja Singh, Gurbakhsh Singh and Lal Singh, besides others. The two stalwarts in the field of prose are Teja Singh and Gurbakhsh Singh. Teja Singh is objective, realistic and scholarly in his approach, Gurbakhsh Singh is subjective, idealistic and sentimental. The style of Teja Singh is marked by simplicity and clarity, while the style of Gurbakhsh Singh is artistic and figurative.

In the field of Punjabi drama, Ishwarchandar Nanda followed the western technique for the first time and depicted realistically the Punjabi characters. The dramatists who made successful experiments after Nanda are Sant Singh Sekhon, Balwant Gargi, Harcharan Singh, etc. The first novelist of repute is Nanak Singh. He exhibits reformative zeal in his novels. Other novelists who followed him are Surinder Singh Narula, Jaswant Singh Kanwal, Narinderpal Singh, etc. Kartar Singh Duggal has made a mark in the field of short story. Other noted short-story writers are Kulwant Singh Virk, Sujan Singh, Gurbaksh Singh and Sant Singh Sekhon.

The Punjabi magazines like Hans, Pritam and Phulwari have also contributed towards Punjabi literary writing.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Mohan Singh Dewana, A History of Punjabi Literature (Amritsar, 1956); S.S. Kohli, Punjabi sahit da itihas (Ludhiana, 1955).

S.S.K.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

RENAISSANCE (Rajasthani). The precursors of the Rajasthani renaissance were Suryamall Mishran (1815-1868), Shankardan Samaur (1824-1878), Ramnath Kaviya (1801-1879), Umardan Lalas (1851-1903) and Maharaj Chatursingh (1879-1929). Suryamall's Vansh bhaskar is encyclopaedic in range and deals with historical events, anecdotes and other interests of the age. His Vir satsai is remarkable for its heroic sentiment, imaginative vision and mastery of craftsmanship. Samaur inspired by Tantia Tope, thundered against foreign domination and favoured the 1857 fight for independence. He was the first to sympathise with the neglected Urmila also. Umardan dealt with the horrors of the Black Famine of 1899. These works, including the poetry of Bankidas and Udairaj Ujal, were sure stirrings of the renaissance—stirrings because renaissance till then was not in full bloom. It made itself manifest from 1947 onwards with its multifaceted ramifications. The post-Independence era was not fertile in poetry, a little less so in short stories and still less in fiction and drama, and practically deficient in personal essay and criticism. Chandrasingh's Vadali and Loo are forceful in bringing out the sweltering heat and scanty rainfall. Meghraj Mukul's heroic 'Sainani' became immensely popular, and continued to be recited for years. Narrative poems, lyrics, satires, stories in verse, historical and legendary poems were published. Nature, not as a stimulus to emotions, was depicted especially by Chandrasingh and Narayansingh Bhati in his 'Saanjh'. A mystical touch was imparted to it by Kanhaiyalal Sethiya whose poems are suffused with mystery, wonder and child-like curiosity. From the physical plane he easily passes on to the mystical one. Bhati stands unique among Rajasthani poets. He is at once traditional and modern. He uses old words in a modern setting. His imagery is surcharged with symbolism, but he has made himself a little obscure because of his involved imagery. Manohar Sharma has left no form of literature untouched and made his mark in all genres. His language is lucid and simple. He and Sethiya have attained mastery in the use of couplets. Sharma has written poems on the patterns of the Meghadoot and Bhramargit. He tends to be allegorical and also symbolical as in Malvani where Dhola is 'jiva', Maru is 'vidya' and Malvani 'avidya'. Poems based on the Ramayana and the Mahabharata have been written by Vimalesh and Shrimant Kumar Vyas. Satyaprakash Joshi specialised in exhortations for peace as in 'Radha' and sexual pictures charged with deep emotion as in 'Bol Bharmali'. He communicated his psychology and philosophy in an appealing manner. Mahavirprasad Joshi is deeply in love with the Mahabharat, the Ramayana and the Upanishads, the distilled essence of which he has narrated in simple and fluent Rajasthani. Nathuram Sanskarta in his 'Kalayan' treats of Nature in various seasons. The most humorous poet is Vimalesh and the satirical one Ganeshilal Vyas 'Ustad'. Premji Prem's 'Chamcho' is typical in delineating the role of sycophants. Shaktidan Kaviya's poem on Rajasthani is incantatory. So is Sethiya's 'Mayar ro helo' on Rajasthan and its glories. Gajanan Varma achieved distinction; so did Hiralal Shastri and Jainarayan Vyas, who wrote patriotic poems to enthuse the people to 'fight' for independence without resorting to violence.

The main protagonists of the novel are Annaram 'Sudama' (Meve ra roonkh), Yadavendra Sharma 'Chandra' (Hoon gauri kin peev ri) and Shrilal Nathmal Joshi. Vijaydan Detha has transformed folk-tales into novels and novelettes. Among the short story writers are Moolchand 'Pranesh', Laxmi Kumari Chundavat, Nrisingh Rajpurohit, Murlidhar Vyas, Deendayal Ojha, Sanwar Daiya, Rameshwarlal Shrimali and others. Rajpurohit and Chandra have made novel experiments in the wake of Gujarati, Marathi and Bengali short stories. Brajmohan Jawaliya is unequalled in writing short stories in scintillating poetic prose as in Jal janjal. Among dramatists are Chandra (Tas ro ghar), Govindlal Mathur (Satrangini), Narayandatt Shrimali (Chhayan tavado), Satyanarayan 'Aman' (Guwad ri jayodi), Rawat Saraswat (Sampadak ri maut), Ganpatichandra Bhandari and others. Most of the plays are social and realistic and at times a little satirical as by Vinod Somani and Baijnath Panwar. Among the essayists are Rawat Saraswat, Sumersingh Shekhawat, Manoharsingh Rathore and others. Nemanarayan Joshi has specialised in the depiction of common characters but is little noticed otherwise.

The late Thakur Ramsingh, Suryakaran Pareek, Narottamdas Swami and Kanhaiyalal Sahal played a prominent role in initiating a silent revolution in letters and enthusing young lovers of Rajasthani to raise its banner high by fulfilling its needs as has been done by the late Sitaram Lalas in his Rajasthani-Hindi dictionary in nine volumes, Badri Prasad Sakariya's in three volumes and Hiralal Maheshwari in his History of Rajasthani Literature.

The renaissance arrived late in Rajasthani literature, but when it came its stirrings were widely and surely felt.

Na. Sa.

RENAISSANCE (Sindhi). The first four decades of the nineteenth century in Sindh bear a fair comparison with the corresponding period in the neighbouring Punjab where the formidable Ranjit Singh (1780-1839) ruled and which showed almost the same medieval way of life. This period in Sindhi literature presented a good contrast to that of Bengali literature which imbibed not in small measure Engligh literature and culture by the middle of the 19th century. If 'medievality' means a simple way of life from the standpoint of education, taste and world-view, Sindh was still medieval in character. It was, as it were, not even struggling to be modern, for it showed no industrial movement which suddenly made other societies modern, and no existence of printing presses, a component of industrialisation, with which prose emerged as a powerful instrument of renaissance and modernity.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In view of their defeat in the first Afghan war in 1836, the British felt the dire political need of annexing Sindh, and by 1843 they were able to fulfil that need. With the annexation of Sindh to the British India in 1843, two vital changes were effected in the multilingual and multiscriptal situation in Sindh. Though the British had, from their point of view, no major impact on the 1800-1843 phase of the Sindhi life, the two new changes were of far-reaching consequence in Sindh. First, following T.B. Macauley's Minute of 1835, Persian as the official language of British India was abolished in Sindh also. Secondly, the Perso-Arabic script for Sindhi was 'invented' and introduced in Sindh in 1853. As regards the first change, the composite way of life in Sindh made it possible to have a greater appreciation for Persian as one of the classical languages of Sindh's historical lines with Persian, the decision of the alien Government to do away with it in favour of English notwithstanding. So much so, the Sindhi Hindus and Muslims, who had hitherto not employed Persian for their creative works, came to employ it, and while writing in Sindhi they deployed the Persian poetic forms of ghazal, marsia, etc., wrought in the Ilm-Aruz, or the Persian prosody.

As for the introduction of Perso-Arabic script for Sindhi, suffice it to say that George Stack (d.1853) and Ernest Trumpp (1828-1885), to name only two foreign scholars among many, voiced their opinion that the Perso-Arabic letters were unfit for the transcription of a Prakritical/Sanskritical language like Sindhi and used Devanagari in their works related to Sindhi, in their dictionaries and grammars.

But lithographic presses established with help from the government produced Sindhi text-books in the Perso-Arabic script apropos the 1853 decision. The first book to come out of lithographic press in Sindh in 1853 was Nandiram Merani's Babnamo, a primer for the new entrants in schools. As instruments like a lithographic press could be used by both the rulers and the ruled, it was by A.W. Strange of the ruling class that the first journal, The Sindhian, was launched in English, in 1854.

It was in 1857 that Sindhi life and literature were shocked into the renaissance period. During the 1857 war of independence, Sindh could not remain cut off from the main current. Its wound was fresh, for in 1843, barely fourteen years earlier, the British had unwarrantedly attached it to the British India. Revolts broke out in the Shikarpur, Sukkur and Hyderabad army camps and the common people—traders, merchants, farmers and artisans—supported the rebellion with money and food. An official of the erstwhile Talpur rulers at one time, Jethmal of Shikarpur helped the rebels in a big way; he supported the plan to destroy the British bastions in Sindh. But the Government got the scent of the move and it failed. Out of the main formulators of the ill-fated plan, Alif Khan was shot dead, and Ali Muhammad Khan Khoso and Darya Khan were sentenced to deportation to Andaman.

After the first war of independence in 1857, a new awakening was seen in the masses and a new spurt was felt in the Sindhi literary activities. That the situation in Sindh continued to be multi-lingual and multi-scriptal is seen from the following three of many illustrations: (i) Surat Singh (1832-1897) authored Divan Surat Bahar, a collection of poems in Sindhi, Urdu, Hindi and Persian; (ii) Ernest Trumpp published Sindhi Reading Book in 1858 and Grammar of the Sindhi Language in 1872 in the Devanagari and Perso-Arabic characters, and (iii) the Sikh Sabha established by Sadhu Navalrai (1848-1893) in 1868 issued literature in Gurumukhi also. In the multi-lingual situation we find that English came to be added as a vehicle of expression. Along with the Englishmen like F.J. Goldsmid, who published Qisso Sasui-Punhu jo into English verse with the original text in Sindhi in 1863, some of the Sindhi people took to writing about Sindhi literature and culture in English.

The Renaissance, though belated in Sindh, was marked by a great ferment during the period between 1843 and 1885. Besides the lithographic presses, the 'Bhagatis' and 'Chaukis', in which stories interspersed with devotional poems and songs were presented, continued to be the means of literary transmission.

Nihalchand (1798-1865), Qutb Shah (1813-1910), Qadir Bakhsh 'Bedil' (1814-1872) and his son Muhammad Muhsan 'Bekas' (1859-1882) were some of the prominent Sufi-Vedantist poets of this period. 'Bedil' says:

> Those who entangled themselves in words,
> Never climbed the ladder of love.

The most distinguished among the Ilm-Aruzi Sindhi poets was Muhammad Qasim (1806-1881), who wrote the Divan of ghazals, qasidas, masnavis and qitas in 1875.

By the year 1885, when the Indian National Congress was established, English education (but in no way Anglicism) found its way into some quarters of Sindhi life and letters. But having found its way, it still had only a hesitant and cautious response from the people. In the provinces where the British had been ruling for a comparatively longer time, the elitist people had gradually been taken in by their way of life and modes of literature. But by 1885 such people as were influenced by them, were disillusioned and they came to appreciate more of their own culture and literature. The people in Sindh, fortunately, did not have to spend (or waste) time to come to realise that the Anglicists among the English-educated elitist classes in the country unknowingly halted the pace of our march towards independence and also that the English education could be used as a means of fighting against the British imperialism on its familiar ground. Thus, English became an influential medium of expression, despite the fact that English-knowing people were a minority. Persons like Sadhu Hiranand (1863-1893) took to journalism in English, and others like Lilaram Watanmal Lalwani, the author of The Life, Religion and Poetry of Shah Latif (1889) wrote literary and cultural books in English.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The renaissance in Sindhi thus covered and touched upon the important genres of literature and brought to surface the spirit of the age, and provided impetus to the creative activity.

Mo.J.

RENAISSANCE (Tamil). Tamil, the oldest of the spoken languages of India, has had epochs of golden age, decadence and renaissance alternating in the last 2500 years. After the golden age of the Sangam, there was a period of stagnation, called the Kalabhra Interregnum, perhaps extending form AD 300 to AD 500. There was a renaissance and a flowering of great literary works like the five great epic poems, the chief of which undoubtedly is Silappadikaram. After a brief interlude, there was the emergence of Kamban, the greatest of Tamil poets, who composed the Ramayana. But the renaissance we shall examine here is that which begins in the early years of this century, owing to the stimulus of several impersonal forces and of two extraordinary men of genius, Swami Vivekananda and Subramania Bharati.

The forces at work fertilizing the efflorescence of a renaissance in the Tamil land were mainly the political ferment, the social reform movement and interest in western education. The most potent of them all was the impact of the west, stimulating a deep fervour to produce in the mother-tongue works in the new genres which had established themselves in the west.

The social reform movement, sparked by Raja Rammohun Roy in the last century, was actively stimulated by leaders like Mahatma Gandhi and Rajagopalachari who worked for the eradication of untouchability and the evils of the caste system. In the Tamil land, Periyar E.V. Ramaswamy Naicker, C.N. Annadurai and Bharatidasan castigated the caste system and pleaded for the enthronement of Tamil. These had the very deifnite effect of making people question the old values and beliefs and traditions, many of which, obviously, had outlived their utility and were now hampering progress. New ideas and values were welcome; innovation was hailed; and the atmosphere actively induced creativity.

The political ferment helped to build up a love of one's own country and one's language. A pride in being Indian and a Tamil became the norm and the emotional fashion of the day.

> Proclaim you are a Tamil
> And walk with the chin up sang a poet, Ramalingam Pillai. If Indianness was a cause of embarrassment earlier, it became the badge of pride and honour; everything Indian was held up to admiration.

Swami Vivekananda must be regarded as the pioneer of nationalism, as he compelled the west to listen to the strident voice of the east; he wiped away the smudge of diffidence and an inferiority complex from the national personality. His thundering speeches in the USA and the UK gave a sense of vicarious pride to every Indian. The philosophy and the religion of ancient India began to be viewed with a new regard and admiration in this country when it realised that they were commanding respect in the sophisticated west.

All the three impersonal forces and the personality of Swami Vivekananda had a good deal to do with the flowering of the renaissance in the Tamil land. But modern literature in Tamil surely began with the advent of Subramania Bharati. With the sureness of touch of a man of genius, he put an end to the long period of imitative mediocrity, of type-cast, command productions and ushered in an era of bold creativity. It was Bharati who fired the first shots of revolt against mental hegemony and literary serfdom, against a deadening conservatism in mental habits and literary mores.

The means by which Bharati achieved such sensational results are easy enough to analyse. The most important of all of them was his uncompromising love of freedom. With all the force of his generous personality, his utter fearlessness and indifference to selfish interests, his passion to experiment and innovate, he was able to effect an amazing metamorphosis in the contents of literary works as well as in what Coleridge calls the externals of poetry, the diction and the metre. The diction became much simpler, in fact the popular patois mostly replaced the learned diction of the previous eras. And in place of the highly organised and complex metres of the past, simpler, easily singable metres came to be preferred.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

A second major change was that Bharati put into poetic focus the common man, unseating kings and nobles. Gone was the custom to write absurdly laudatory panegyrics on crowned heads. Perhaps this change would have crept into the literary scene of the Tamil land by slow stages with the winds of democracy blowing, but Bharati ushered in the change with his characteristic expedition.

A third qualitative change, perhaps a natural consequence of the second, was Bharati's urgent advocacy of revolutionary changes in the political, social and economic fabric and his giving the pride of place to this in his writings. A measure of the change introduced by this man of genius can be had by comparing his works with those written just prior to his advent; these were preoccupied with puranic themes, with the deeds and misdeeds of royalty. And Bharati raised aloft the standard of emancipation for woman also and many of his poems have this as their major message. During the Renaissance, though poetry continued to be composed, the most typical product of the age was prose. One reason for this is that with the democratisation of education, a much larger number of persons read books and magazines now as opposed to a small coterie of well-read people in the earlier eras, who could understand the more exalted diction employed in poetry. Perhaps much of the subject-matter of today's books and periodicals is prosaic, not in any uncomplimentary sense, but prosaic because it does not deal with idealised beauty, grace and harmony. A feature of modern poetry is that small poems are perferred to long ones and epics have become rare. A recent trend, in keeping with the 'muktakavita' of the north and the modern poetry of the west dispenses with all rules and regulations; but perphaps it is still searching for an identity of its own.

In the footsteps of the incomparable Bharati came Bharatidasan, Desikavinayakam Pillai and Namakkal Ramalingam Pillai. Bharatidasan must be regarded as the best of the post Bharati poets. There is clearly a marked preference for prose and a corresponding lack of enthusiasm for poetry. Poetry flourishes only on the nutriment purveyed by deeply emotional inter-personal relationships which are rare to find and nurture in the predominantly urban societies of today.

The novel is a new literary form in Tamil. The Tamils, and indeed all Indians, are great storytellers, but the novel as we understand it today is a new literary genre which we owe to the West. Indeed, the Tamil novel shows the impact of all the forces analysed earlier. The social reform movement and the nationalist fervour both have shaped the Tamil novel; and the tremendous urge provided by Swami Vivekananda and Bharati could not but have a big impact on this popular art form. Some major novels in Tamil during the early phase are Vedanayakam Pillai's Pratapa Mudaliar charittiram, C.V. Guruswamy Sarma's Premakalavatiyam, T.K. Sarayana Muthup Pillai's Mohananki, B.R. Rajam Iyer's Kamalambal charittiram and Madhaviah's Padmavati charittiram. Mu Varadarasan gives high praise to the last work by Madhaviah who contributed significantly to the development of both the content and the form of this genre at this incipient stage of its growth.

The Tamil novel has been considerably enriched and stimulated by an astonishing number of good-quality translations from Bengali, Marathi, Hindi and Malayalam novels. Besides these, original writing in this genre has been much encouraged by the leading periodicals which arrange for novel competitions. As a result of both these stimulating factors, there has been a considerable output of both historical and social novels. The real pioneer of the former was Kalki whose skills at fabrication of the plot, characterisation and presentation coupled with his sedulous research into tomes of history have made his works immortal.

The short story, with its total emphasis on form and structure, is entirely a western import. Here again the chief agency which helped to develop the art form and popularise it among the people was the periodicals. The oldest among the Tamil periodicals which must be credited with actively stimulating the short story was Manikkodi through which Pudumaippittan and Ku.Pa.Rajagopalan became known to the literary world. They still rank as the greatest short-story writers in Tamil. Other writers of notes pawned by Manikkodi were Na. Pichamurthy, Na. Chidambarasubramanian, Si. Su. Chellappa, Mowni and Alagirisamy.

Playwriting has never been regarded as a literary exercise in the Tamil land. No play has come down from the ancient Tamils who should have staged plays and enjoyed them too. Clearly actors improvised the lines as the play went on, but they were never written down. Unfortunately the same attitude which regards the play as non-literature continues even now. No play written in the last 100 years can be read for literary enjoyment. Indeed, apart from the literary aspect of plays, Tamil theatre must still be regarded as not very well-developed; it compares poorly with the standards set by the Andhras, the Bengalis and the Maharashtrians. Tamils seem to love farce best, and serious drama of a high standard is only rarely seen.

Vi. Ko. Suryanarayana Sastry and Sundaram Pillai were the pioneers in playwriting in Tamil. Two remarkable operas followed, one entitled Visuvanatam by C.S. Muttuswamy Iyer and the other, Pugalendi by A. Natsarasa Pillai. Both are historical and of considerable merit. P.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Sambanda Mudaliar wrote a number of good stage plays and should be given the highest credit for breathing life into this field of art and injecting a modicum of respectability to the profession.

Renaissance in Tamil thus covered the entire gamut of literature and touched upon all genres. It reflected the spirit of the age and gave a momentum to creative exuberance.

A.V.S.

RENAISSANCE (Telugu) ushered in new modes of expression in Telugu literature in the later half of the nineteenth century. The literature prior to that period was marked by rigid conventionalism and pedantry.

Mainly under the impact of Western education, the renaissance ushered in a new era. The first wave came in the second half of the nineteenth century and the second wave emerged as romantic movement which swept the twenties of the present century.

The great reformer Raja Rammohun Roy was the father of the Indian renaissance. In Andhra, Kandukuri Veeresalingam Pantulu was the first writer influenced by Raja Ramamohun Roy. His revolutionary writings brought a remarkable change in Telugu literature. He wielded his pen as a 'mighty weapon' to capture the hearts of the people of Andhra. He fearlessly fought against the age-old superstitions in society. He exposed corruption in high places and the immoral life of the aristocrats. He gave a new impetus to the prose literature and introduced new literary forms as a result of his exposure to English literature. His approach to social and religious problems of the day was rational. Thus the emergence of modern Telugu prose is a valuable gift of the renaissance. The new prose was free from stiff and pedantic style of earlier times, and acquired ease, force, clarity and simplicity. The writings of Veeresalingam Pantulu have directness and vigour that were necessary to carry home his reformistic views, moral values and theistic doctrines. He contributed to genres like the essay, novel, literary criticism and diaries, besides journalistic writings and farces. In the first stage of renaissance in Telugu literature, many classics were translated and adapted. One of Veeresalingam's contemporaries was Vavilla Vasudeva Sastri, who translated Julius Caesar. Veeresalingam adapted Twelfth Night and The Merchant of Venice in Telugu, making them suitable for Indian atmosphere and setting.

Shakespeare's plays influenced the writing of drama in Telugu prose at the beginning. Panuganti Lakshmi Narasimha Rao wrote a cycle of plays on the theme of the Ramayana, influenced by Shakespearian plays. His social plays too, like Kanthabharanam and Kokila, were influenced by Shakespeare's comedies. He wrote essays titled Sakshi under the influence of Addison and Steele and their Spectator essays. They were full of humour and satire which are characteristic of his essays. Veeresalingam Pantulu wrote in 1880 Rajashekhara charitra, a novel inspired by The Vicar of Wakefield. He wrote in Telugu the first autobiography and the first authentic biographies of ancient poets entitled Andhra kavula charitra. Veeresalingam's works in prose and verse displayed a severe moral tone and high seriousness of purpose. Both Venkataratnam and Veeresalingam worked for Brahmo Samaj which was started in Bengal. Devulpalli Krishnasastri became its literary exponent by writing lyrics which became very popular all over Andhra. His devotional songs and poems gave expression to despair and rapture in adoration of the Lord. The twin poets Venkata Parvateesa Kavalu wrote Ekantaseva, describing all phases of the love of the human soul for the divine. Mutnuri Krishna Rao, through his popular weekly Krishnapatrika, propagated nationalist ideals and aesthetic values.

Kolavennu Ramakotiswara Rao was another journalist and writer who, through his writings in Triveni, a cultural quarterly which he edited, worked for cultural integration. Under the editorship of Kowta Sriramasastry, Sharada, a monthly magazine, held aloft the renaissance idealism by publishing articles on painting, sculpture, music and literature. Bharati, under the editorship of Kasinadhuni Nageswara Rao, made its appearance during this age and is still a powerful vehicle for upholding the traditions of liberalism and good taste.

Gurazada Appa Rao contributed much to the propagation of renaissance ideals by writing in a vein quite contrary to the traditions of verse and by employing the spoken language in his prose writing. His play Kanyashulkam is an example of this innovation. He popularised the verse form 'mutyalasaram' (a string of pearls) deriving inspiration from simple folk-melodies. His play illustrates the second phase of the impact of renaissance in Telugu literature.

Chilakamarthi Lakshmi Narasimham roused patriotism through his moving poems, novels and translations of English writings on the glory of Indian heritage. Rayaprolu Subba Rao, the oldest of the modern poets, wrote remarkable patriotic poems on the history and glory of Andhra harmonised with a unified vision of Indian culture. In fact, he became the leader of the Romantic movement. He exalted love in his poems and portrayed woman as an elevating and sanctifying force in human life. Other poets like Devulapalli Krishna Sastri in his Krishnapaksham, Viswanatha Satyanarayana in his Kinnerasani patalu, and Nanduri Subba Rao in his Yenkipatalu also idealised the woman. Similarly, Vedula Satyanar-ayana Sastri, Basavaraju Appa Rao and Adavi Bapiraju placed woman on a high pedestal. Universal love too inspired Telugu poets to soar to lofty heights. Tallavajjhala Sivasankara Sastri's poem 'Hridayeswari' is an expression of this idealism.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

While many poets wrote short lyrics, Sri Pingali Lakshmi Kantam and Katuri Venkateswara Rao composed a long narrative poem Soundaranandam, dealing with the story of Nanda, the step-brother of the Buddha, and Nanda's passionate love for his beautiful wife. It describes how his infatuation for his wife is finally transmuted into universal compassion. Soundaranandam occupies a special place among poems of love because the action is set in the Buddhist period and reflects the essence of Gandhian thought.

The poets of the renaissance paid attention to the amelioration of the lot of the common man. Poets like Jashuva and Duvvuri Rami Reddy wrote on the peasants and the downtrodden with great sympathy and warmth. Krishivaludu of Rami Reddy is an example. Gabbilamu of Gurram jashuva describes the glory of ancient India, constrasted with the pitiable conditions before independence. He makes a fervent plea for the uplift of the poor. He brings out in his writings the ideals of liberty, equality and fraternity. Tripuraneni Ramaswamy Choudary is another follower of Raja Rammohun Roy. His Suta puranam stands as a literary monument of rationslistic thought.

Shivabharatam by Gadiyaram Venkata Sesha Sastri portrays the heroism of Sivaji, Similarly, Rajasekhara Satavadhani's Ranapratapa charitra and Madhunapantula Satyanarayana Sastri's Andhra puranam praises the heroes of history. Vanamaamali Varadacharyalu's Potanacharitra, Gurram Jashuva's Bapuji and Jandhyala Papaya Sastri's Karunashri also uphold the spirit of hero-worship. Kodali Venkata Subba Rao wrote on the glory of Hampi in his Hampikshetram. It is a masterpiece which reminds one about the great Vijayanagar empire which marked the zenith of the glory of Andhra race.

Renaissance brought in another interesting element, i.e. love of Nature in all its aspects. The Romantic poets unlike the poets of the past, observed Nature in all her moods. Devulapalli Krishna Sastri, Kavi Kondala Venkata Rao and Nanduri Subba Rao reveal the fullness of Nature's beauty in their poems. Gurram Jashuva's Mumtajmahal describes the glory of Art that conquers time.

C. Ramalinga Reddy stands unique among the writers of literary criticism. His Kavitwatattva vicharamu is the best example of his pioneering work in the field of literary criticism. He was also a poet and his Musalamma maranamu, a narrative poem, extols the immolation of a young lady for the welfare of her community. He was mostly inspired by English critics like Matthew Arnold. Though he wrote literary prose, he welcomed innovations in the sphere of poetry. Another typical product of ranaissance in the field of criticism is Surya-devara Sanjiva Dev. He is mainly an art critic. His literary criticism reveals much perception and width of outlook. Amarendra (Chaturvedula Narasimha Sastri) has carved for himself a unique place in Telugu literature as a critic and a story writer, inspired by the spirit of Indian renaissance.

Moving with the times and describing the struggle of the people of India for independence and giving credence to Gandhian thought, the Telugu writers too showed progress in their writings. Garimalla Satyanarayana's 'Manakoddu ee tella dora tanamu' (Enough of this white man's rule) was on the lips all people that fought for the freedom of the country. Tummala Sita Ramamurti's Atmakatha (Mahatma Gandhi's autobiography) won for him a worthy place. He is called the poet-laureate of Gandhism. Basavaraju Appa Rao's spirited lyrics on the historic Dandi March during the Salt Satyagraha are very inspiring. The influence of Gandhism was so great on the fabric of social and political life of Andhra that it made Unnava Lakshminarayana write a unique novel Malapalli and Adavi Bapi Raju to write Narayana Rao. Adavi Bapiraju was an artist by profession and stood for high values of taste in music, poetry, art, dance and philosophy. His novel Narayana Rao reflects all these aspects. Viswanatha Satyanarayana's novel Veyipadagalu portrays the revivalist aspect of Indian renaissance. His dislike for Western culture is quite evident in this novel. Venkata Parvateeshwara Kavulu translated several patriotic Bengali novels into pure Telugu and kindled the spirit of patriotism in Andhra. Satavadhani Velury Sivarama Sastri's contribution to Telugu literature is also praiseworthy. He ably translated Saratchandra Chatterji's novel into simple Telugu. During the Gandhi Centenary celebrations Mahidhara Ramamohan Rao brought out his novel Kollayi gattitenemi (What if he wore a loin cloth?) which faithfully traces the influence of Gandhian movement on the pattern of Andhra rural life during the three generations of time in his own village.

As mentioned earlier, the drama in Telugu literature started with translations and adaptations of classics from Sanskrit and English. Gurazada Appa Rao's Kanyashulkam was the first original and social drama. The revolutionary Bidugu Ramamurthy initiated a powerful movement to shake off the fetters of grammatical rules and to bridge the gulf between spoken and written word. Gurazada Appa Rao responded to this movement. Plays like Mewad patanam, Roshanara and others kindled the sparks of freedom in thousands of people. Gandhivijayam and Ramarajyam, written by Damaraju Pundarikakshudu, show the politcians of the day as characters. These plays brought about national awakening and instilled a burning desire for freedom among the people.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The renaissance gave an impetus to historians and scholars to write about the richness of our past. Mallampalli Somasekhara Sarma, who started as a poet, turned a noted historian with creative insight.

With the rise of the Progressive movement in the forties, the Romantic Movement in literature received a setback. Under the strong influence of Marxist ideology, the idealism of the renaissance slowly receded into the background. Truth, Beauty and Love, which governed the Romantic movement, faded away. Progressive writers like Sri Sri, Srirangam Narayana Babu and others showed purposiveness and social awareness in their writings. Sri Sri led these writers, carrying the banner of revolt into the citadels of literary convention and breaking the barriers between prose and verse. Thus the second wave of the Indian renaissance which touched Telugu literature in the twenties began to ebb in the early forties.

But by and large as a consequence of Indian renaissance, patterns of literary expression and traditional lines of thinking were gradually replaced by idealistic and visionary outlook on the problems of human life. It is no exaggeration to say that the renaissance gave a new Earth and a new Heaven to the writers of Andhra who enriched Telugu literature through their creative writing.

V.Ra.

RENAISSANCE (Urdu). The change in content, tone and approach in Urdu poetry at the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the present one is generally known as the Renaissance of Urdu poetry. A change simply cannot be termed renaissance. Renaissance is a euphemism for revival, and pre-supposes reintroduction of an old and subsequently given up form or style. This criterion does not apply to the aforesaid changes in literary trends. However, this 'change' can be classified as renaissance only restrictively. Urdu poetry of the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries was replete with real human feelings, particularly those of dejection in love. But in the 19th century, notwithstanding the giant poets like Ghalib, Momin, Anees and Dabeer, the general tendency was towards formalism. Much emphasis was laid on technical acrobatics like difficult rhymes and long and remote sorts of 'radif' (repetitive ending), sometimes forming more than half of the second hemistichs of 'ghazal' or 'qasida'. In Delhi, Shah Naseer was the most outstanding poet of this school, followed by his former disciple, Zauq.

Novelty in semantic approach was almost given up, and repetition of former poets' observations with all emphasis on observance of classical prosody was adhered to. In Lucknow, poets showed many formalistic novelties like giving up many Indian words and usages, emphasis on word-play and lascivious references to women's physique and behaviour. The latter tendency also degenerated into 'rekhti' poetry in which male poets express female coquetry in feminine idioms.

All this resulted into degeneration of poetry, and from no angle did it remain a source of inspiration. It reduced itself to worthless entertainment. The reason why this tendency dominated society was that in the first half of the 19th century, Urdu was patronised by decadent aristocracy both in Lucknow and in Delhi. It wanted to escape the harsh realities of life, and to lose itself in frivolities.

After the revolt of 1857, the decadent aristocracy was eliminated, and even the new feudal society began to look towards the educated Indians who wished to build a new type of society. No one, even in high circles, had time to waste on frivolities, and almost everyone sneered at old tastes and tendencies. Moreover, the Victorian culture of the British and the puritanism of the reformist movements like the Arya Samaj and wide vision of Vedantists like Vivekananda and Ramatirtha also cast an indirect influence on the tastes and tendencies of the society that wrote and read Urdu.

The new consciousness sought various channels of self-expression and, therefore, it is not proper to consider renaissance as some kind of unified movement with uniform thinking and approach. There were Syed's supporters like Shibli, Hali, Ismail and Mohammad Husain Azad, who wanted to bring the spontaneity and simple charm of English romantic poetry into Urdu. There were protagonists of patriotism (though not rebellious) like Saroor Jahanabadi and Chakbast Lakhnavi. There were great poets like Iqbal and Akbar Allahabadi, who reacted against the tendency of following the British culture and literary sensitivity; between these two, too, the approaches were poles apart. Akbar stood for the revival of the cultural values of the mid-19th century, while Iqbal popularised the vision of a theocratic and ruthlessly active world society formed on the ideals of the nascent Islam of the 7th century.

The new tendency gave rise to thematic poetry, and a lot of short poems, devoted to popular themes and written in a variety of recognised forms, were written by the above mentioned poets and their disciples and followers. A D.P.I. of Punjab also tried to organise 'munazimas' in place of 'mushairas'. In a mushaira of that time, all poets recited 'ghazals' composed in a previously announced metre and rhyming pattern. For a munazima a topic was announced beforehand and poets recited poems in any form or of any length on that topic. The munazimas did not continue for long but gave birth in due time to the modern type of 'mushaira'. The mushairas mentioned above are called 'tarahi', 'tarah', being the model hemistich given to poets for indicating the intended metre and rhyming pattern. In modern mushairas there is no restriction of topic or tarah, and every poet can recite poems or ghazals of his own choice.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It was not only in the matter of thematic poems that the new wave of consciousness showed itself; the tendency of being relevant came in ghazals, too. The decadence of poetry was more visible in Lucknow than in Delhi or other centres of Urdu. In the last quarter of the 19th century, two new main centres of Urdu poetry emerged. These were Rampur and, a little later, Hyderabad. The rulers of these states invited and employed great poets. At Rampur we find top poets like Dagh, Ameer Minai, Jalal and Taslim. In their ghazals the main theme was still that of love, but the feelings were real and 'infectious', and there was no vulgarity or word-play. Dagh and Ameer later went to Hyderabad. Even in Lucknow, poets like Safi came out boldly against the lifeless formalism, word-play and vulgarity of the mid-19th century poets and composed sweet, chaste and effective ghazals. In the same vein wrote other poets like Hasrat Mohani, Firaq Gorakhpuri, Yagana Changezi, Aziz Lakhnavi, Shad Azimabadi, Jalil Manikpuri and many others.

Close on the heels of these poets of sober eroticism emerged some very great poets who injected eroticism with Sufism. Prominent among them were Asghar Gondavi, Fani Badayuni and Jigar Moradabadi. Actually they were different from Safi, etc. only in that while Safi etc. emphasised salient features of their tone and approach, the others laid emphasis on the Sufi consciousness of cosmic unity.

Later, this trend was replaced by the progressive trend, and still later, by 'jadidiyat' or neo-existentialism. Thus the trend which was considered novel and revolutionary a hundred years ago, is now considered old and traditional.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Altaf Husain Hali, Muqaddama-e-shiar-o-shairi; A.H. Junaidi, Urdu adab ki tarikh; A.P. Goyaliya, Sher-o-sukhan (parts II and III); Mohammad Baqar, Tarikh-e-nazm-o-nasr-e-Urdu; Masaud Husain, Muqaddama-e-tarikh-e-zaban-e-Urdu.

Sa.K.

RENU, PHANISHWARNATH (Hindi; b. 1921, d. 1977) was born at Aurahi Hingna in district Purnia, Bihar. His schooling in an institution run by the Koirala family of Nepal gave him his grasp of Nepali language, and the proximity of his village to Bengal gave him his fluency in Bengali. Renu took active part in the Nepali revolution and even wrote a book on it. Subsequently, he was drawn towards Jayaprakash Narayan and was jailed during the Emergency. He was honoured with 'Padma Sri' by the Government of India—an honour he returned in protest against atrocities perpetrated on the people. He was not very happy, too, with his experiment in Bombay where he had gone for the filming of one of his famous short stories 'Tisari qasam'.

Renu was a trendsetter, an acclaimed writer of regional novels. Even some of his short stories are characterised by an intense involvement with the region to the point of a romantic attachment to the Maithil region where he was born. His significance lies in the fact that he writes as one of the people of the region and not as an outsider, trying to understand the problems of village life from an urban sympathetic stance. His writings, therefore, reveal an involved realism bordering on the romantic, arising from first-hand experience. Renu's Nepali connections are evident in his short story, 'Dasgajja ke is par aur us par'. In Parti: parikatha his sketch of the Nepali character of Dilbahadur is equally sensitive. Besides, his knowledge and love of the Bengali language and literature resulted in the creation of many Bengali characters, sketched accurately, in his novels. The heroine of 'Julus' is a Bengali. In his involvement with the village folk, he is nearer the tradition of Premchand but with a difference; in Renu we find an appreciation of the character of a region as a whole rather than an appreciation of individuals. His novel Maila anchal deserves special mention as a land mark in post-Independence literature. It pioneers a trend in regional novel where the region and its identity become the main theme, nay, the very protagonist of the novel. His realism is of a very particular brand in as much as he gives a kaleidoscopic picture of the region, its characters and the various facets of its life—political, social and religious. His treatment of the realities of village life is touched with an all-encompassing sympathy which includes both hope and despair, struggle and failure or partial achievement. What marks out Renu from other regional novelists is his grasp of the rhythm of everyday life expressed in a language which at times acquires a poetic dimension.

His other major works, besides short stories, are Deerghtapa (Novel) and Rinjal Dhanjal (Reportage).

R.L.

RIBEIRO, S. J. DIOGO (Konkani; b. 1560, d.1633) was a writer and lexicographer. Working as a missionary at Salcete, he analysed, corrected and improved on the works of Stevens' Doutrina Cristam (Christian Doctrine) and Arte da lingua Canarin (Grammar of the Konkani language). A self-disciplined, hard-working scholar and master of Marathi, Hindi and Sanskrit, he contributed to Konkani works of outstanding value. His Declaracam da Doutrina Cristam (1632) is a monumental work, and its only copy extant is found in the National Library of Lisbon. His work is a testimony to his profound knowledge of native religious vocabulary. Unable to find proper expression for his ideas of Catholic dogma in Konkani, he freely used Portuguese vocabulary, already naturalised by the missionaries. And he did not hesitate to use Konkani words where they suited him. For instance, he used Vaikuntha (heaven), a thoroughly Konkani word, racy and of the soil, to express heaven.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Ribeiro also translated into Konkani Vidas dos Santos (Lives of saints) by Fr. Pedro Ribadaneyra. His other outstanding works are his vocabularies in two volumes: Vocabulario da Lingua Canarin (Vocabulary of the Kanari language, 1626). Both these volumes, found in the Panjim National Library in manuscript form, contain various idiomatic phrases with 14,500 entries. Distinguishing between the modern and the old, the literary and popular Marathi and Konkani, he uses polished words like 'patra' for chalice used in high society. Thomas Stevens, Ribeiro and others can be called the first Orientalists who studied the idioms and phrases of India and compared them with those of the East and the West. His vocabulary is scholarly and authentic on many scores.

A.P.S.J.

RIGVEDA (Sanskrit) literally means 'knowledge of prayers' (rik, prayers; veda, knowledge). It is a collection of prayers, rather a grand collection of ten smaller books of prayers, and is the oldest literary document of the Indo-Europeans. The first group of the Indo-Aryans reached India probably some time in the first half of the second millennium BC. There is, however, no definite indication in the Rigveda of the Aryan immigration into India, and we can only assume that a considerable time must have passed between the first settlement of the Indo-Aryans and the final stages in the composition of the Rigvedic hymns. From the topographical data in the Rigveda it appears that the bulk of the Rigveda was given the final form in India, the land of the seven rivers.

Form and Structure: The Rigveda is divided into ten smaller books or 'Mandalas' (cycles) of hymns or 'suktas' (good sayings) consisting of verses or 'riks'. The longest hymn consists of fifty-eight verses and the shortest only one verse. These hymns contain, on the average, ten verses. The total number of verses in the Rigveda, including supplementary hymns, is 10,552 (10,472+80). Studies in the Rigveda reveal several stages in its composition and compilation. One of the striking features of the six of the ten books of the Rigveda is that each has been composed by the seers in a single family. The seers in the families of Gritsamada, Vishvamitra, Vamadeva, Atri, Bharadwaja and Vasishtha were the authors of the books. The second notable feature of the six books is that in each one of them hymns are arranged deity-wise. Hymns addressed to Agni occupy invariably the first place and those addressed to Indra the second. Then follow hymns addressed to other deities. In the deity-groups hymns are arranged according to the diminishing number of verses. It is pertinent to note that each family book was self-sufficient for ritual pruposes. This means that each cycle was an independent collection orally preserved in each of the six families of the seers. The first book contains fourteen groups of hymns ascribed to one common seer, some of the hymns belonging to the families of Vishvamitra, Kanva, Gautama, Vasishtha and other famous seers. In the eighth book, the order in which hymns are arranged in the earlier books is not followed. Metrically also the eighth book possesses a specific trait in its use of the strophic or 'pragatha' metre.

The ninth book was made up perhaps to provide a handy collection for the benefit of the chanting priest. The supplementary character of the tenth book is quite obvious. Identical number of hymns (191) in the first and the tenth books suggests that the tenth book was modelled on the first. One important feature of this book is that all sorts of hymns, magical, ritualistic, religious, secular, narrative and philosophical, have found a place here. The floating mass of hymns that could not find a place in the first eight books were gathered together to constitute a separate and final book. The matter left over by the final compilers of the Rigveda was later utilized by the compilers of the Atharvaveda. Studies of the books where seers of only one family are authors of hymns reveal that roughly speaking four generations took part in the composition of a family book. Thus a round number of one hundred years may be accepted for the composition of a family book and also that of a multi-family book. Between the compilation of the first nine books and that of the tenth book, there is a distinct time gap which can be proved by comparing mythological and linguistic data of the two parts. The tenth book may have taken a fairly long time. Thus a rough estimate of a period of two hundred years may be accepted for the composition and compilation of the entire Rigveda. The Rigveda itself refers to two distinct literary epochs in the composition of hymns. The Rigvedic compositions may have begun in the twelfth century BC and the grand collection may have come into existence in the tenth century BC.

Language and metre: The hymns of the Rigveda are composed in the Old Indo-Aryan language, known as Vedic language whose later form came to be known as

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Sanskrit. There must have been a number of dialects, probably as many as tribes, when the hymns of the Rigveda were being composed. Of all such dialects the one spoken by the Bharatas probably played the most important role. The word 'Bharati' (lit, related to the Bharatas) means 'speech' which developed in the course of centuries into Sanskrit. The one distinctive feature of the Vedic language is its accent which is of a musical nature. The Vedic language is highly flexional and very rich in all important morphological processes, e.g. affixation, suppletion, composition and reduplication. It is also more synthetic than Sanskrit. The order of words has, however, no important role to play either in Vedic language or in Sanskrit. The place of preposition is fixed in Sanskrit but not in the Vedic language, and it has therefore given to the Vedic language greater pliability. The language of the Rigveda as a literary and oral tradition must have helped develop a standard form of speech.

The whole of the Rigveda is composed in metres as prayers to be chanted or sung. The smallest metrical unit called foot or pada usually consists of eight, eleven or twelve syllables. A verse usually consists of four feet or padas but sometimes it is made-up of padas of different length. In the Rigveda metres the rhythm of the last four of five syllables (called the cadence) is rigidly determined. The padas of eleven and twelve syllables have a caesura also. Seven metres have been regarded as standard metres. They are gayatri (3=8+8+8+24), ushnik (3=8+8+12=28), anushtubh (8+8+8+8=32), brihati (4=8+8+12+8=36), pankti (5=8+8+8+8+8=40), trishtubh (4=11+11+11+11=44), and jagati (4=12+12+12+12=48). There are many subvarieties of these metres altering the order of various feet.

MYTH AND THEOLOGY: The Rigvedic gods are personifications of natural phenomena, such as sky, sun and dawn. They are conceived human in appearance, and their chief physical attributes are power, strength and brilliance. They protect the honest and punish the guilty. The three-fold division of the Vedic gods according to the regions (heaven, air and earth) they occupy is suggested by the Rigveda itself (1.139.II). Thus there are celestial gods, atmospheric gods and terrestrial gods. They are also divided on the functional basis. The oldest Indo-European God is Dyaus, the shining one (GK. Zeus), who is the personification of the sky. Heaven and Earth (Dyava-Prithivi) form the most important dual divinity of the Rigveda. Varuna (GK.Oruanos; Boghaz Koy Ins. Uruvanass), the encompassing one, is a universal monarch and a great upholder of moral order. He is also identified with the highest God (Ahur Mazda) of the Iranians. As Ahur Mazda and Mithra in the Avesta, so Varuna and Mitra in the Rigveda form dual divinity. Gods like Mitra, Savitr, Surya, Pushan and even Vishnu represent different aspects of the Sun. Mitra (Boghaz Koy Ins. Mitras), represent the beneficial aspect of the sun, and is identified with the Iranian God Mithra. Savitr, the stimulator, represents the stimulating aspect of the sun. The celebrated Savitri verse (Rv.3.62,10), which has been the morning prayer in India since the Vedic times, is addressed to this God. Surya (Kassite Surias; Avesta Hvare), refers to the luminary itself. Surya as such is the most concrete of the solar deities. Pushan, one who brings prosperity, represents the beneficent power of the sun, manifested chiefly in its pastoral aspect. Vishnu, the active one, is the personification of the activity of the sun. Nasatyas (Boghaz Koy Ins.Nasatia) are other important celestial gods, invoked in more than fifty entire hymns. The etymology of the word Nasatya is, however, obsecure. Their other name Ashvin, horseman, does not offer clues to the original meaning of the word Nasatya. Ushas, the Goddess of Dawn, is the most beautiful of all Rigvedic goddesses. She happens to be the 'daughter of heaven'. Twenty hymns have been addressed to her. Indra is the most famous Rigvedic god in whose honour about one-fourth of the hymns of the Rigveda are composed. The name Indra, rather Indara, occurs in Boghaz Koy inscription too. In the Avesta, however, Indra is the name of a demon, where he is also referred to as Verethraghan, killer of Verethra (Rigveda Vritra). In India, he led the Aryans in their victorious march against the non-Aryan foes, and emerged ultimately as the national god of the Vedic people. He is said to represent the most terrifying natural phenomenon consisting of thunder, storm and rain. Maruts are other prominent gods of the Rigveda and as many as thirty-three hymns are addressed to them. They are said to represent the natural phenomenon of thunderstorm and are Indra's companions in his fight with the demons. The god Rudra, howler, who is described as the father of Maruts represents the natural phenomenon of rainstorm in its distinctive character. Other important gods are Agni (Fire), a ritualistic god invoked in some 200 hymns, Soma (Av. Haoma) linked with sacrifice, and functional gods like Brihaspati (Lord of prayers), Vishvakarman (All-creating), and Aditi (lit. Un-binding, liberation).

It is really difficult to draw a clear line between magical practices and religious rites in the primitive cultures. The history of the Rigvedic word 'Brahman' reveals the transition from magical practices to religious worship. In the Rigveda the original meaning of the word 'brahman' (neu. and radically accented) is incantations or spells. Varuna the great magician or mayin is mentioned as making brahman. If brahman (neu.) means spells, brahman (Mas. and suffixally accented) should mean 'one who practises divinity'. Agni, Indra and Brihaspati are called brahman. The Rigveda reveals both strata of religion, popular and priestly. Yajna (Av. Yasna) or worship was one of the main religious practices of the Vedic Aryans, and 'worship' means offering with prayers. A Rigvedic word 'medha' which originally meant meat-juice, came to denote animal sacrifice. The idea that various deities were but different forms of a single divine being, what is known as monotheism, had its beginning in Rigveda. The transition from monotheism to monism is also found in the Vedic hymns, which draw a distinction between the individual soul and the Universal Soul. Cosmological speculations ranging from folk-tale naivety to mythological tales and theological puzzles and, at times, to abstruse thinking may also be seen here. The Creation hymn (10.129), which explains the universe as evolving out of the one, makes even a bold sceptic assertion that even God who controls this universe probably does not know its origin.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

LITERATURE: As a religious book the Rigveda is the composition of a particular class—the priestly class, but it preserves in ample measure popular literature, embodying popular customs and incantations. Many incantations are magical, based on folk-life and beliefs; others have a literary freshness about them. Of all these incantations the famous rain-spell in the seventh book (7.103.7) is very important from the literary point of view. Here the frogs are compared with the Brahmanas who, sitting around the brimful vessel, talk at the soma-rite of Atiratra. So frogs gather at the pool to honour this day of all the year, the first of rain-time.

Besides these incantations, the marriage hymns (10.85) and fueneral hymns (10.14.18) contain a number of magical spells. Of the five funeral hymns the eighteenth is remarkable for its poetic beauty. When the dead is buried the mother earth is implored thus:

> Wide open earth, O press not heavily on him;
> Be easy of approach to him, a refuge safe;
> As with a robe a mother hides
> Her son, so shroud this man, O earth.

Another class of popular literature consists of popular tales in the form of a dialogue (e.g. one between Yama and Yami, or one between Pururavas and Urvashi). There may be even obscene dialogues such as the one between Agastya and Lopamudra (I. 179) or between Bhavayavya and Romasha (I. 126.6-7) and between Indra and Indrani (10.86). The next class of popular literature is constituted by riddles, besides maxims, in a number of verses. A greater part of the Rigveda consists of religious prayers, but the smaller part which contains a variety of subjects other than religion is very important from the literary point of view. It is true that the Rigvedic prayers were generally intended to accompanyd different rituals and frequent references to the sacrifice mar their poetic beauty, but now and then prayers addressed to gods give rise to beautiful descriptive poetry. Similarly, the narration of the heroic deeds of a god like Indra produces good narrative verse.

The Rigveda, in fact, contains poetry that is lyrical, narrative, devotional,dramatic. philosophical and didactic, besides panegyric. Its lyricism is par excellence delicate, and is embedded in other forms of poetry too. Its descriptive poetry is mainly nature poetry which, at its best, is also lyrical, because it is the phenomena of nature that have been the subject of description. Both aspects of nature—the tender and charming, and the grand and awesome—equally impressed the Vedic mind. The gracefulness in nature aroused the seer's feeling as he composed his prayers to Ushas, Savitr and Surya. Ushas, perpetually unrolling her unaging beauty, moved the seers most. Bharadvaja writes about her:

> We see that thou art good; far shines thy lustre; thy beam, thy splendour have flown up the heaven. Decking thy self, thou makest bare thy bosom, Shining in majesty, thou Goddess Morning. (6.64.2)

The awe-inspiring aspect of nature is depicted in the hymns to maruts, Parjanya and Vata, etc. Parjanya, the rain-god, is depicted as a mighty bellowing bull that quickens the earth. He shatters the trees and smites the demons. He is likened to a car-driver whipping his horse on: 'far off resounds the roaring of the lion' and the sky is filled with rain clouds. Again, Indra's fight with Vritra and other demons has been the main topic of narrative poetry. One fine example is the hymn in which his war exploits have been described very forcefully:

> Who slew the Dragon, freed the seven rivers and drove the kine forth from the cave of Vala, begat the fire between two stones—the spoiler in warriors' battle, he,O man is Indra. (2.12.3)

The refrain 'he, O, man, is Indra' at the end of every verse except the last suggests that it is a ballad.

There are prayers in the Rigveda, especially those addressed to Varuna, which may be characterised as devotional poetry. Atri thus implores Varuna:

> If we have sinned against the man who loves us
> Have ever wronged a brother, friend or comrade
> The neighbour ever with us, or a stranger
> O Varuna, remove from us the tresspass. (5.85.7)

It is reasonable to treat these prayers as early specimens of devotional literature.

The elements of dramatic poetry in the Rigveda may be seen in its dialogues, e.g. the dialogue between Vishvamitra and the rivers (3.33), between Indra and Varuna (4.42), between Varuna and Agni (10.51), between gods and Agni (10.52), between Agni, Varuna and Indra (10.124) and between Sarama and the Panis (10.108). Of these dialogues the one between Vishvamitra and the rivers is the most attractive. These dialogues appear to have been fragments of narratives, and may be treated as precursors of drama.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Some of the best philosophical poetry in the Rigveda emerges from cosmogonic hymns, the important ones among them being 121 and 129 in the tenth book. The recurring refrain, 'which god shall we honour by means of sacrifice' is answered in the tenth verse which proclaims the unknown god to be Prajapati. In the first verse of this hymn the Creator had appeared under the name of 'Hiranyagarbha' germ of gold, now identified with Prajapati. The implication is that the plurality of the gods means nothing, as only the creator Prajapati, the one God, deserves honour. The hymn is important for its philosophical speculations and high poetry and begins with a description of the time before creation > of day and night there was then no distinction.

> No death was then, nor was there life immortal,
> That one alone breathed breathless by itself
> Then, that forsooth, no other being existed.

In that One, Kama (libido), 'the mind's first seed' arose, leading to creation.

In the Rigvedic times every priestly family cultivated the art of poetry and the seers were professional verse-makers. They did not live in isolation, but fully participated not only in religious life but also in political and social affairs. Vishvamitra and Vasishtha were intellectual leaders of their time. The Rigveda speaks of two main literary epochs, the old and the new. What the seers of the older generation composed became models for the younger generation, corroborated by expressions like 'Atrivat' (like Atri) and 'Kanvavat' (like Kanva). The Rigvedic compositions extend over centuries and so they vary in literary merit as well as in style, both natural and ornamental.

The Rigvedic hymns were composed, on the whole, with a remarkable degree of metrical skill and command of language. The Rigvedic poetry developed its own symbols, mainly ritualistic, but at times also aesthetic, metaphysical and mystical, covering a wide spectrum of life. While the hymns to Ushas are very rich in visual imagery, those to Parjanya are well known for their auditory images. Similarly nature, agriculture, domestic implements, different professions and practices of men, and rituals supplied material for similes. The excellence of the Rigvedic poetry lies in the profound use of symbols, living imagery, similes, metaphors and other figures of speech, significant diction, and finally the harmonious combination of sounds for poetic effect.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.A. Macdonell, Vedic Mythology (1897); A.A. Macdonell and A.B. Keith, Vedic Index (1936); A.B. Keith, The Religion and Philosophy of the Vedas and Upanishads (1916); F. Maxmueller, Rigveda and Sayana's Commentary (1849-73); R.T.H. Griffith, The Hymns of the Rigveda (1889-92); V.K. Rajwade et al Rigveda Samhita with the Commentary of Sayanacharya (1933); Vishva Sandhu, A Vedic Concordance (1945-73).

H.M.

RIGVEDA PRATISHAKHYA (Sanskrit). The word 'pratishakhya' literally means that which belongs to every shakha or school of the Veda, adhering to its own particular text. Different schools arose in course of time on account of differences in the matter of the preservation of the text of the Vedas. Shakha ultimately came to mean a particular text or recension. Thus came into existence 'Shiksha', the science which teaches proper articulation and pronunciation of the Vedic texts. The treatises, really representative of the Vedic phonology, are the pratishakhyas which are directly connected with the Samhita and the word-text. The Rigveda pratishakhya of Shaunaka, the teacher of Ashvalayana, belongs to the Shakala shakha of the Rigveda. It seems that in its present form it may only have been a collective production of the school of Shaunaka. It is the earliest work extant on Vedic phonology (shiksha). The date of the Pratishakya cannot be ascertained but it appears to be pre-Panining.

The text of the Rigveda pratishakhya consists of eighteen sections (patalas), divided into three chapters (adyayas) of six sections each. Each section is divided into sub-sections (vargas) which generally consist of five stanzas except at the end. The division of the text into sections appears to be similar to the one organised in first stage of its composition. The division into chapters is based on the division of the subject-matter.

The division into sub-section is obviously artificial. The first section is concerned with the Vedic phonetic system, enumerating vowels and consonats, their varieties and peculiarities, the second with the combinations and mutations of vowels and the third with the accentuation. The next three sections deal with the combinations and mutations of consonats and the three following with the Krama text. The twelfth section explains the internal and external efforts preceding the utterance of phonemes. The fourteenth section indicates the faults in pronuciation. The fifteenth section sets the rules for reading the Vedas. The last three sections deal exclusively with the metre. A careful reading of the work shows that it lacks unity of subject-matter. Thus it is said that the work as a whole cannot be the work of one and the same author. There have been some later accretions to the text.

The Rigveda pratishakhya is a metrical composition, composed partly in the 'anushtubh' metre and partly in the 'trishtubh' or 'gagati' metre. These compositions have been divided, according to their meanings, into rules. The total number of rules in the Pratishakhya is 1068.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Pratishakhya is the natural corollary of the composition of the word-text of the Rigveda. It deals with various phonetic categories, such ass articulators, place of articulation, vowels (monophthogs and diphthongs), semi-vowels, and fricatives. The technique employed in the treatment of combinatory phonetics, although descriptive, led to good results. Almost every phenomenon of phonetic combination is given a significant technical name. No arbitrary terms like those used by later grammarians are found in the Pratishakhya. As these terms are shared also by other Pratishakhyas, they may be considered older. The style is direct and clear and no attempt is made to economise on words at the expense of the meaning. The scientific approach adopted in the Rigveda pratishakhya, while dealing with a variety of phonetic topics, was certainly resposible for the subsequent growth of Sanskrit phonology.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.K. Varma, The Rigveda pratishakhya with Hindi translation (Banaras, 1970); M.D.Shastri, The Rigveda pratishakhya, Vol.2 (Allanhabad,1931), Vol.3 (Lahore,1937), Vol.I (Banaras, 1951).

H.M.

RISALA KARIMI (Sindhi). Shah Abdul Karim's poetry and 'malfuzat' (sayings) in Sindhi appeared for the first time in a Persian work, Bayan al-arifin, written by the saint-poet's disciple, Miyan Muhammad Riza ibn Abdul Wasi alias Mir Daryai Thattawi, in 1630, six years after the saint-poet's death. Bayan al-arifin contains introduction, seven chapters and epilogue of what Shah Abdul Karim said for the 'hidayat' (instruction) of his 'murids' (disciples). It collects his wise sayings, aphorisms, instructive tales and the Sindhi 'bayts'. The manuscript remained in dark until it reached the hands of one Abdul Rehman ibn Muhammad Muluk, who translated it into Sindhi in 1798. In 1874, Mukhdum Abdul Samad ibn Hajji Muhammad Muqim Navarangapota made some modifications in the old Sindhi translation of 1798 and published it from Bombay. In 1904, Mirza Qalich Beg, a distinguished Sindhi author, edited the Sindhi bayts and published the volume by the title of Risala Karimi (Collection of mystical poetry by Karim).

Mirza Qalich Beg says in the preface to his Risala Karimi that while editing it he collated the MS. by the original author himself and the other manuscripts available now. But, as the later editor of Shah Abdul Karim's poetry, Allama U.M. Daudpota, has shown us, the Mirza did not take pains while executing his job. A poet, dramatist, novelist, critic and editor of the texts, all in one, he undertook many writing works at a time, and did not quite care whether all of them came off well to the best of his abilities. In 1937, U.M. Daudpota published Shah Karim Bulria ware jo kalam (The poetry of Shah Karim of Bulri), an edition marked by his great scholarship and erudition. According to him, 'In the original manuscript, Bayan al-arifin, the Sindhi bayts have been written clearly and correctly in an old, till-then-not-standardised semitic script for Sindhi and translated liberally in Persian. It seems Mirza Qalich Beg either couldn't follow the script or perhaps ignored the original manuscript and depended upon the incorrect text of the Sindhi translation of the Persian manuscript published from Bombay.'

Because of inadequacy of the semitic script for Sindhi in the times of Miyan Muhammad Riza and also of the later manuscript writers, many letters of the Sindhi alphabet stood at once for various sounds: it rested on the reader to decipher what letter signified what sound(s) in the context of the overall meaning of the bayts, incorporated as they were in the Persian text of the manuscript. It is necessary to know here that b of the Sindhi script then was equal to b, b' and p; t=t, th, ṭ and ṭh; s=s, t and ṭh; p=p and ph; j=ja and jh; ň=ň, j' and jh; ḍ=ḍ, dh and ḍh; r=r, ṛ and ṇ; kh=k, kh, g, g' and gh; n=n and ṇ

Like the preceding translation of the Persion manuscripts of 1798 and 1874, Risala Karimi, too, faltered and fumbled over the deciphering of the Sindhi script and failed to give flawless readings of the Sindhi text. It was U.M. Daudpota's Shah Karim Bulria ware jo kalam which accomplished the job competently. Besides, Mirza Qalich Beg did grave injustice to Shah Abdul Karim, when he observed in his introduction to Risala Karimi (p. 28) that 'his poetry is not qualitatively such and quantitatively much as would qualify him to be a poet. Instead, it is better to designate him as a great spiritual man of Sindh. No discerning reader of Shah Abdul Karim's poetry will agree to what the Mirza says about him as a poet.

A work of great historical importance, Risala Karimi paved the way for the later scholars to produce well-done editions, including the one by U.M. Daudpota, mentioned above, and Karim jo kalam (Poetry of Karim, 1963) by Memon Abdul Majid Sindhi.

Mo.J.

RISHABHDAS (Gujarati; 14th c.) was a medieval Gujarati Jaina poet from Khambhat. As his ancestors organised pilgrimages (Sangha), they were known as Sanghavi. He too had visited Jaina places of pilgrimage like Shatrunjay and Girnar. He was a staunch follower of Jaina precepts.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

He was well-versed in Sanskrit and Prakrit and was a scholar of repute.

His main contribution is 'Rāsas' or narrative poems treating religio-historical themes. As stated in his well-known work Hirvijaysuiras (1929), Rishabhdas is supposed to have composed 34 rasas, 58 stavanas and a number of gits, stutis and namaskars. But except Kumarpalras (1614), Bharat-Bahubaliras (1922), Hitashiksharas (1626) and Hirvijaysuiras (1629), none of his works is available in printed form. It is doubtful if all the remaining pieces are written by the author of the above four rasas, because they mention Rishabh or Rikhabh or (Rishabhdas/Rikhabhdas) which may not indicate the same person. Nevertheless, this poet seems to have contributed a good deal to Gujarati poetry.

Kumarpalras gives biographical details of Kumarpal, Vanaraj Siddharaj Jaysinh and Ajaypal. It also contains descriptions of events of religio-historical significance in poetic language. It abounds in didactic aphorisms and sayings and is written in two 'khandas' running into 4500 verses.

Bharat-Bahubaliras is a full-length story of the previous births (purvabhavas) of well-known princes, Bharateshvar and Bahubali, in 84 verses of duhas and deshis.

Hitashiksharas is a long didactic poem of 2000 stanzas in duhas and deshis, and offers valuable advice on religion in particular and life in general.

Hirvijaysuiras is the best of the lot, which narrates the life-story of the Jaina monk Hirvijaysuri and, more significant, is the narration of events pertaining to his association with the Mughal Emperor Akbar, whom Hirvijay had offered religious sermons. The interest of the poem is sustained on account of poetic imagery and delightful descriptions.

Of the numerous other rās poems, Sthulibhadraras, Jivavichararas, Shrenikras and Mallinathras are worth mentioning.

Manuscripts of these rasas, stutis and sajjhays are preserved in the libraries situated in various places of Gujarat and Rajasthan.

K.D.

RISHIVARDHANSURI (Gujarati; 15th c.), a Jaina poet of early medieval Gujarati literature, belonged to the Anchal Gachha sect of Jaina monastery. He was a disciple of Jayakirtisuri. Only two of his works are available, viz. Nalaraya Davadanti charita (1456) and Jinendratishaya panchashika. Nalaraya Davadanti charita is an early Rasa work of 321 stanzas on the story of Nala-Damayanti, which has influenced the later rāsas on Nala-Damayanti by Mahiraj and Megharaj. Rishivardhanasuri has described in short the story of Nala-Damayanti strictly according to the Jaina version (in which Damayanti is called Davadanti) as given in the Trishastishalaka-purusha-chartitra by Hemchandracharya. The other work Jinendratishaya panchashika deals with the extraordinary characters of a Jaina Tirthankara.

R.C.S.

RITI (Sanskrit). The 'riti' school of poetics is represented fully by its chief exponent Vamana, author of Kavyalankara-sutravritti, who flourished in Kashmir towards the close of the eighth century AD. According to him riti or style or mode of expression constitutes the soul of poetry. It is a special arrangement of words deviant from the normal, colloquial expression, and this speciality is based on the 'gunas' or excellent qualities: figures of speech, both of sound and of sense, which have a role to play in enhancing the beauty of poetry, though only a subordinate one. It is the gunas that form the vital elements in poetry in producing beauty of expression. Vamana wanted writers to go deeper and not to be content with the superficial alankaras. Even an unfavourable critic of the riti school like Anandavardhana conceded that the riti is a feeble attempt at enunciating the basic fact of poetic vision and its transfer to the readers through the medium of language.

Vamana's riti is anticipated in the 'marga' of the South Indian writer Dandin, author of Kavyadarsha, who is generally considered the exponent of the guna school. The distinction between the 'vaidarbha' style and the 'gaudiya' style was known even to Bhamaha, the earliest important writer on poetics who cautions against praising the vaidarbha and condemning the gaudiya, and says that both styles have a place in good literature. But in Dandin we find the earlier partiality for vaidarbha and aversion to gaudiya given great prominence. He takes the vaidarbha style as the best and says that it contains all the ten poetic qualities properly balanced. The ten qualities are: (1) Ojas, i.e. strength through the use of long compounds, a quality popular mainly in prose, (2) Prasada, i.e. clarity and lucidity, (3) shlesha, i.e. coalescence or well-knittedness, the words combining without any ruggedness, (4) Samata, i.e. evenness of sound within a line, (5) Samadhi, i.e. ambivalence through the use of metaphor, (6) Madhurya, i.e. sweetness, (7) Sukumarata, i.e. softness or delicacy, (8) Udaratva, i.e. exaltation, (9) Arthavyakti, i.e. lucidity of meaning, and (10) Kanti, i.e. grace.

Vamana took the ten gunas of Bharata and Dandin, but treated them separately as belonging to the expression and as belonging to the meaning, thus making their number twenty. He defined them in his own way to suit his theory of riti, and stated that all the gunas existed clearly and fully in the 'vaidarbhi riti', while only a few of them existed in other ritis.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

External qualities based on the expression are ten: (1) 'ojas' or compactness of structure or cohesiveness, (2) 'prasada' is malleability of structure, and comes along with ojas. The alternate appearance of ease and compactness adds to the beauty of a poem, (3) 'shlesha' is smoothness and coalescence, (4) 'samata' is homogeneity of diction throughout, (5) 'samadhi'is sense of symmetry owing to the orderly ascent and descent, (6) 'madhurya' is distinctness of words achieved by excluding long compounds, (7) 'sukumarata' is absence of harshness, (8) 'udarata' is liveliness of composition, making the words seem to be dancing, (9) 'arthavyakti' is clarity of meaning, and (10) 'kanti' is richness of words.

The ten gunas pertaining to the meaning, as explained by Vamana, are: (1) ojas, i.e. boldness vigour in the expression of ideas, (2) prasada, i.e. clarity of meaning and avoidance of superfluity, (3) shlesha, i.e. the proper commingling of many ideas, (4) samata, i.e. uniformity, by the use of proper sequence of ideas, (5) 'samadhi,' i.e. ambivalence through the use of metaphor, (6) 'madhurya', i.e. strikingness of utterance, (7) saukumarya, i.e. freedom from disagreeable or inauspicious ideas, (8) udarata, i.e. avoidance of vulgarity by the use of delicate expressions, (9) arthavyakti, i.e. explicitness of ideas which makes the nature of things clear, (10) kanti, i.e. the conspicuous presence of the rasas, through the representation of excitants (vibhava, etc.).

Vamana is emphatic about the importance of gunas pertaining to the sense in making the vaidarbhi style really charming. Maturity of expression or 'paka', making it impossible to replace a word by its synonym, is achieved by the use of gunas. Mahimabhatta has pointed out in his Vyaktiviveka that the rich suggestiveness of vaidarbhi style is due to its absence of long compounds, leaving each word to convey its maximum load of suggested meaning.

To the two early styles vaidarbha and gaudiya of ancient writers, Vamana added a third one called 'panchali'. All these are geographical names and suggest the styles popular in those regions. He defines them as follows: Vaidarbhi is that style which is untouched by even the slightest blemish, which is full of all the qualities and which is as sweet as the notes of a lute.

The Gaudiya style is characterized by ojas and kanti but is devoid of madhurya and saukumarya; it is full of long compounds and bombastic words. Panchali is the style which has the qualities of madhurya and saukumarya and is devoid of ojas and kanti. It is soft and sweet and resembles the puranic style.

Vamana is the first to make a clear distinction between 'alankaras' or figures of speech and gunas or qualities of poetic excellences. Gunas are more intrinsic and produce poetic charm, while alankaras are external and only help to enhance its beauty.

Later, Rudrata adds 'latiya' to make the number of ritis four. Though the names have a geographical association, they are really related to the theme and the sentiment. Later, 'vrittis' like 'kaishiki' described in the Natyashastra were also associated with ritis and applied to poetry. Thus vaidarbhi riti is associated with kaishiki vritti and shringara and karuna rasas. The gaudi is linked with arabhati vritti and associated with raudra and bhayanaka rasas. The panchali and latiya occupied middle positions. A verse ascribed to Rajshekhara says that the panchali riti gave equal importance to sound and sense, as in the case of Bana and Shilabhattarika.

Anandavardhana took the cue from Bhamaha and accepted only three gunas - madhurya, ojas and prasada, and considered them as directly connected with the rasas and affecting the mental moods, 'chittavritti'. According to him they are referred to as associated with the expression or the meaning only in a figurative way. Later critics like Mammata followed him and tried to include all the other gunas of Vamana in one or the other of the three gunas, or in some alankara or in some quality free of defects. Jagannatha Pandita tried to explain the three gunas in terms of 'chittavrittis' or effects on the mental moods produced, thus helping in the realization of the rasas.

Among later writers Kuntaka refers in his Vakrokti-jivita to three geographical ritis–vaidarbhi, gaudi and panchali—but does not recognize them as correct. He wants to explain the ritis subjectively as based on the character of the poet (kavi-svabhava). The three styles indicated by him are 'sukumara' (graceful), 'vichitra' (striking) and 'madhyama' (mixed); though differing in themselves all the styles have their own appeal to the readers. He accepted four poetic excellences or gunas as characterizing the styles: madhurya, prasada, lavanya and abhijatya. All these excellences appear differently in the different styles, but are present in each.

Though the poet's original aesthetic experience and his imaginative powers are important in the creation of poetry one has to remember that poetry is written with words, and what is available to the critic for objective analysis and study is the expression consisting of words and their meaning, through which alone any idea about the soul of poetry can be studied and apprehended. The critic has to analyse the poetic expression, and contrasting it with the normal colloquial expression he has to find out the salient features of deviance and try to understand the means adopted by poets enriching the suggestive possibilities of the language. This analysis of poetic expression and the theories formed as a result of the study are to be used as a means for appreciating and enjoying literature. The riti school developed by Vamana was a serious attempt in this direction and left an indelible impression on all later critics. Questions as to how far these apparently objective traits of the expression could be considered subjective and capable of revealing the inner aesthetic experience of the poet were discussed by writers like Anandavardhana, without, however, being able to give a clear solution. The very elusiveness of the problem is a challenge to the critics, and the riti theory of Sanskrit criticism seems to be highly relevant in the context of modern studies in linguistics and the philosophy of meaning.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.K.Warder Indian Kavya Literature, I (Banarsidass, Delhi); A.Sankaran, Rasa and Dhvani (Madras University); K.Kunjunni Raja (Tr.) Kavyalankarasutravritti (Eng tr.) (Trichur, 1948); P.C. Lahiri, Guna and Riti; P.V.Kane, History of Indian Poetics; S.K.De, History of Indian Poetics ; V.Raghavan, Some Concepts of the Alankara Shastra (Adyar Library).

K.K.R.

RITTHASAMUCHCHAYA (Prakrit/Apabhramsha) is a work dealing with ritthas (Skt. rishta) omens or portent, foretelling the advent of death. The work has been composed in Sauraseni Prakrit in gatha metre by Durgadeva, disciple of Samyamadeva, a Digambara Jaina monk who flourished about AD 1032 and also authored two other works, Arghakanda and Mantramahadadhi.

The present work is in Prakrit gathas and deals mainly with the ritthas which include, besides omens and portents, other things such as the various signs seen in (or over) one's body, the different events connected with the natural phenomena, the nature of the dreams in sleep, or a number of artificial devices such as the number and nature of letters which constitute the question about a rittha put by a questioner.

The work which was written, having in view the basic Jaina ethical dogmas and contemporary socio-religious conditions, occupies a unique place in Jaina literature in so far as it covers a non-dogmatic field, not covered by other works of the Digambara Jaina tradition.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ritthasamuchchaya (Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan, Bombay, 1945).

A.S.G.

RITUSAMHARA (Sanskrit), literally meaning 'brief narration of the seasons', is a lyric poem attributed to Kalidasa (c. 4th c.AD). In the six cantos of this poem, the series of six Indian seasons has been described with an amorous overtone in a delicate and fascinating manner. The text was published by William Jones, the famous Indologist, in Calcutta in 1792. It was subsequently published by various scholars with Latin, German, and English translations. One of its noteworthy editions has been prepared by W.L. Pansikar with the commentary of Manirama from Bombay in 1906.

The authenticity of the authorship of Ritusamhara has been doubted by many eminent Indologists, while several scholars have sought to associate it with Kalidasa. Both groups have put forward arguments either to support their own contentions or to refute the views of others. Those who believe that the Ritusamhara is an immature work of a great poet of promise argue that it cannot be brushed aside as an insignificant composition of any ambitious poetaster, because an intimate study of the poetic diction, charming imagery and exuberance of spirit cannot but reveal the stamp of a skilful artist. The delicate observation of nature, colourful depiction of the flora and fauna as well as glowing sketches of amorous love bespeak of a distinctive poetic vision. Moreover, it seems that Vatsabhatti borrowed expressions from the Ritusamhara in his Mandasor inscription dated AD 472.

But, on the other hand, there are strong arguments in the repertory of those who do not subscribe to the view that the Ritusamhara is a juvenile work of Kalidasa. They argue that it differs from the famous works of Kalidasa in many respects so that it does not seem to have stemmed from the same creative personality. Mallinatha, the great literary commentator, significantly, does not refer to it at all. Thus, at the beginning of his commentary on the Raghuvamsha, Mallinatha speaks of only three poems of Kalidasa on which he prepared his commentaries. Not only that, the Ritusamhara has been ignored by the anthologists and rhetoricians as well. It is also argued that its style is basically conventional and its descriptions are stereotyped; there are more blemishes than evidences of skill. What is more important, the poem lacks the delicate human touch, which is the hallmark of the visionary mind of the great poet. Moreover, the evidence of Mandasor inscription is far from conclusive because the proximity of expression might simply mean that the Ritusamhara was composed at a time when Kalidasa's personal halo was too imposing to be ignored by an ambitious younger poet.

The controversy remains inconclusive since eminent critics on both sides argue and counter-argue but conclude in the end according to their personal preference. The names include Hillebrandt, Keith, Winternitz, S.K. De. At any rate, it has to be noted that in spite of a conventional approach, the poet of Ritusamhara seems to have an accomplished mind with an appreciable sense of craftsmanship. Some of the pictures of six seasons, notionally conceptualised by a romantic lover, are definitely praiseworthy. The central motif of the poem seems to have been fashioned out of a resemblance to the poetic schemata, envisaged in the Purvamegha of the Meghaduta. Besides, the colourful depiction of spring in the third canto of the Kumarasambhava and the ninth canto of the Raghuvamsha and that of summer in the sixteenth canto of the Raghuvamsha might show that the Ritusamhara bears distant echoes of expressions in which human feelings have been successfully blended with the natural panorama. Some of the verses in the dramas may also be referred to here whose underdeveloped versions may have first occurred in the Ritusamhara.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The approach to love in Sanskrit lyric poetry is generally ornamental and sensual rather than discursive or philosophical. The Ritusamhara is no exception as its poet too tried to cater to the demands for refinement, beauty and luxury. In the days of the Imperial Guptas, pleasure with refinement was asked for in urban life, while pleasure with elegance was sought for in art and literature. If there is excessive artificiality due to stylisation, the reason is to be sought in the community life of the age. It is quite plausible that a great poet of the future may also be equally infatuated by these constant allurements, but when the moment of unrestricted creativity dawns, the fetters are automatically done away with and he plunges into great depths. Therefore, the Ritusamhara may have only practically demonstrated to Kalidasa himself the importance of deliberate transmutation of worn-out poetic tradition. This composition may have induced him into finding the turning point at which an innovative poet like Kalidasa should free himself from the tradition and find his orginality.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Hillebrandt, Kalidasa (Calcutta, 1971); Maurice Winternitz, History of Indian literature Vol. III (Delhi, 1985); Ramji Upadhyaya, Sanskrit and Prakrit Mahakavyas (University of Saugar, 1962); S.K. De, History of Sanskrit Literature (Calcutta, 1947).

Ta.B.

ROHAL FAQIR (Sindhi; b. about 1726, d. about 1805) was a saint-poet and mystic, and exponent of Hindu philosophy. Zangeja by caste, Shia Muslim by religion and a sufi by practice, he was considered to be a great saint-poet-Kabir re-born in Sindh. He held a high position under king Ghulamshah Kalhoro of Sindh. When about 46, Rohal renounced the world along with his wife and two sons, Shahu and Ghulam Ali, and became an ascetic. Two of his sons Khuda Bux and Dariya Khan were born later. Excepting the third son, all his sons became well-known saints and poets in their own right. After wandering for a few years, Rohal eventually settled at Kandri, a village in district Sukkur in north Sindh. Rohal has written poetry, not only in Sindhi, but also in Hindi and Saraiki, which in fact was his mother tongue. His four shastras Man prabodh, Adha-budh granth, Sarb Jnan and Agam varta, all in Hindi, coming from the pen of a Muslim saint, is a unique feat. He is an eminent exponent of Hindu Vedantic philosophy. He is also the author of Krishna padas, Artees, Holis, etc., which are often sung by people on the border of Sindh and in Marwar (Rajasthan). Among his followers, the Hindus constitute a predominant majority. His descendants continue to live in Kandri.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gurudinomal B. Daryani (ed.), Kandri-je-faqiran jo kalam; Rughumal Motwani (ed.), Rohal-jo-kalam.

Hi.D.

ROHV (Kashmiri) is the name given to a particular kind of dance-songs in Kashmiri literature. The dance in which such songs are sung with the rhythm of the dance is also called rohv. Hence it is difficult to ascertain whether the songs owe their name to dance or the dance to the songs. As a lexicon entry, this word has been given both the meanings. In the old books the word 'rohv' has not been specifically mentioned so that its exclusive connotation could be determined. In fact, the word 'rohv' has found its way in our poetry from the vast treasure of folk-songs.

This word is pronounced as 'Rouf' in Srinagar and some other towns of the valley, but in rural areas the original pronunciation of the word is in vogue. To pronounce 'rohv' as 'rouf' makes no sense at all and is merely a meaningless distortion of the original word.

Rohv is a folk-dance in which ten, twenty or more women form two rows in standing position, and face one another with a slight movement in their feet. One row goes on singing a song befitting the occasion and the other row repeats the refrain continuously. The movement of feet accelerates as the song proceeds towards its crescendo. Finally a stage comes when every one seems to be dancing in joy. The songs sung during the dance are normally the folk-songs. This folk-dance is regularly performed during autumn and in the month of Ramzan throughout the valley, particularly in rural areas.

Rohv in the bygone days formed a part of 'Hafiza nagma'. It was later adapted to 'Bacha nagma'; but with the advent of Radio and Television, 'bacha nagma' too lost its ground rapidly.

Now the rohv has become a part of 'Chakri', which is a kind of chorus singing. In between the chorus the introduction of rohv changes the entire complexion of singing; the tempo increases and when it reaches the crescendo, the listeners are transported to a far off dreamland. Its soothing influence and charm are something which cannot be expressed but only experienced.

Though rohv songs are the songs of joy and gaiety, sometimes when a pathetic episode finds its expression through a song of this kind, the listeners are in tears. Rohv songs are essentially the inheritance of the women folk. The major part of rohv in the folk-literature is the creation of the collective effort of mothers and sisters. It has thrived with them through the ages.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The main qualities of such songs are their spontaneity, flow and sweet words all strung together in the song movement, fast rhythm and lucid expression. The rohv being basically a folk-form, no fixed norms of prosody are observed in its composition. The sentiments of love, sorrow, longing, etc. can form the subject-matter of the rohv songs. In form, tempo and content, the rohv is close to 'Lol', another form of folk-songs. Refrain is a must for rohv. Normally refrain is repeated after every line. Sometimes 'Vatsuns' are sung as rohv, but the original rohv songs have their own individuality, grace and charm. The songs in a short metre are more popular, attractive and melodious. Those who have added to the theasure of rohv songs are Haba Khatoon (16th c); Arnimal (d.1800), Naima Saab (1800-1880), Maqbool Kralwari (1820-1875), Shams Faqir (1843-1904), Mehmood Gami (d.1855), Rasul Mir (d.1870), Ghulam Ahmad Mahjoor (1885-1952), Samad Mir (1900-1959), Ahad Zargar (b.1908), Fazil Kashmiri (b.1914) and Ghulam Nabi Ariz (1916-1965).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ali Mohd. Lone (ed.) Kashmiri luka bath, Vol. I (Srinagar, 1965); Motilal Saqi (ed.) Kashri luka bath, Vol.III (Srinagar, 1967); P.N.Chopra (ed.) The Cultural Fabric of India (Delhi, 1982).

Mo.S.

ROMANTICISM (Assamese), as an aesthetic ideal, made its full impact felt in Assamese literature with the almost simulataneous publications in the early years of the second decade of this century of two significant anthologies of poems, Pratima (The icon) and Kadamkali (The bud of Kadamba) by Chandrakumar Agarwalla and Lakshminath Bezbarua. These two poets along with Hem Goswami were known as the romantic trio. It was they who shared among themselves the credit of ushering in the new movement in Assamese literature. Romanticism, as it manifests itself in Assamese poetry, is marked by certain distinctive features which its original source, that is, English poetry, also reveals in great abundance: the recognition of a living soul in nature, a deeply personal love, an interest in the supernatural, the recreation of the medieval lores and legends, a sympathetic treatment of the commonplace, the employment of the language of daily use and a search for new verse-forms. Most of these characteristics are evident in the poetry of the romantic trio.

In Chandrakumar, nature ceases to serve, in the classical manner, as a backdrop to human situation. He introduces in one set of his poems the Wordsworthian faith inasmuch as he invests the simple beauties of nature and its familiar sports with the enchantment of something mysterious and unknown. In another set, he deals with the supernatural almost in the line of Coleridge. Here, he paints the unknown and handles the improbable as though they belong to the world of everyday experience. Thus, his poetry reflects the twin elements of romanticism, a sense of awe in the presence of the unknown, and a feeling of wonder at the revelation of the known. Lakshminath, in his turn, wrote some of the finest Assamese lyrics. These lyrics conform to the Palgravean idea of the genre that it is woven around some 'single thought, feeling or situation', rather than something to be sung. Besides, he wrote the first ever literary ballad in Assamese, thus, ushering in another new genre which was to receive further nourishment in the hands of Ananda Agarwalla.

Each of the second generation of romantic poets who flourished in the twenties and the early thirties strikes a personal note. They also present an 'enigmatic family likeness' inasmuch as each one of them is concerned with one or more of the three perennial subjects, viz., personal love, patriotism and mysticism. It may be noted that the poets of the first generation dealt with these subjects, but only in their way.

Among the poets concerned with the subject of spirituality, Durgeswar Sarma dealt with it on the metaphysical level and never went by intuitive vision alone. Nalinibala Devi, the poetess of Sandhiyar sur (The twilight melodies, 1928), delved deeper to have the intuitive realization of a pantheistic scheme of things. Ratnakanta Barkakati, another poet with a mystic overtone, gives wings to a desire for the Infinite which he identifies with the supreme bliss of Beauty.

Of the poets of personal love, Ambikagiri heads the list. For love encompasses the whole existence, and earthly love is but a step in the ascending staircase which leads to divine life. He is followed by Jatin Dowerah, who passionately sings about the painful aspects of love.

The third generation of poets who flourished between the late thirties and the mid-forties introduced certain new notes and new ideas, which are not to be found in English romantic poetry. They drew nourishment from the native soil. While some turned to Tagore as they painted the things of beauty, others like Jyotiprasad Agarwalla, Prasannalal Chowdhury and Binanda Barua were indebted to Gandhian thought for the enrichment of their patriotic poems from a different angle. Ganesh Gogoi chose to follow Dowerah. Devkanta Borooah published his memorable verses of love-poetry under the title Sagar dekhicha (Have you seen the sea, 1945). With their elfin music and delicate imagery, both of which echo Swinburne at his best, these verses represent the last flickers of the dying lamp of romanticism in Assamese literature.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

M.B.

Fiction and Drama : Though romanticism found its main expression in lyric poetry, it left its mark on fiction and drama also. Two major writers of the romantic movement were Chandrakumar Agarwala (1867-1938) and Lakshminath Bezbarua (1868-1938). Bezbarua's Padum Kunwari and Suravi are historical narratives, dealing with the dilemmas of romantic heroines caught in the trap of unfeeling feudal laws which have scant respect for their aspirations. Bezbarua is also a pioneer in the field of short stories. His 'Lao-khola' and 'Nakao' show in adept handling of the romantic theme.

Towards the end of the 19th century, the romantic novels which came to be written in Assamese, were influenced by English novelists such as Walter Scott. The historical novels of Scott made many Assamese novelists look back to the past. The notable among these writers is Rajanikanta Bardoloi (1867-1938) who sometimes looked back to the history of Assam to find his subject. His most outstanding novel Miri jiyori is a tragic love story—a moving rendering of the life of the Miri tribal people. The novel centres round the love story of Panai and Jonaki who suffer untold hardships, subjected as they are to harsh tribal rules. These lovers are also exploited by the cynical, self-serving bourgeoisie of the town. The other important novels of Bordoloi are Monomoti, Radhai ligiri and Dunduya droh. Another important novelist of this period is Padmanath Gohain Barua. His Bhanumati (1891) and Lahari (1892) have a historical setting.

The Assamese novel had not yet fully developed as a literary form. The romantic novels gave primacy to individual aspirations, though social commentary and romantic love went hand in hand in these novels. Besides, humanism, as pointed out by Hiren Gohain, is another important characteristic of the fiction of this period which broadened the horizons of the Assamese consciousness, still feudal and religious.

There are certain other features which distinguish the novelists of this period, who may broadly be consideredd romantic. Love, particularly romantic love, is the central theme of their novels. Such love comes into conflict with society and has tragic consequences, though spiritually it is triumphant. Sometimes there are parallel love stories in a novel, such as in Jaymati by Lakshminath Bezbarua, or in Karengar ligiri by Jyotiprasad Agarwala. Though history forms an important setting in the novels, it does not interfere with the main line of the story. Patriotism is yet another common feature though the impact of the national freedom movement is not yet felt. The writer looks back mainly to the first war of Indian independence (1857 Mutiny). Some of the other important novelists of the romantic era are Dandinath Kalita, Daibochandra Talukdar and Dinanath Sarma.

In the field of drama, plays had appeared much before Lakshminah Bezbarua and other writers of the 'Jonaki' age started writing. In 1888 appeared a translation of Shakespeare's The Comedy of Errors, published in Jonaki, the literary magazine. A comic play of Lakshminath Bezbarua, Litikai, too appeared in this magazine, which shows the dramatist's inventiveness in creating absurd situations. Bezbarua is perhaps at his best in such historical plays as Chakradhwaj Sinha, Jaymati Kunwari and Belimar. Which reveal elements of romanticism chivalrous characters, heroic socrifice and glorious past. He tried to bring in historical characters in his plays, without distorting them out of the context. The influence of Shakespeare's Henry IV may also be seen in the creation of some characters and comic situations. These plays are in prose, unlike the plays of most other dramatists of the period. Jaymati Kunwari is Bezbarua's most successful play. Jaymati is a legendary princess in Assamese history. To save her husband, she did not reveal his identity to a tyrant who tortured her to death. The character of Dalimi, the Naga damsel, whom Godapani (Jaymati's husband) meets, while in exile, is a successful creation. As with other playwrights of the period, Bezbarua's plays are full of songs. The songs of Jaymati derive their idiom from the folk songs and devotional poems of Assam.

The other important dramatists of this period are Chandradhar Barua, Durgeswar Sarma, Padmanath Gohainbarua, and Ambikagiri Roychoudhury. Padmanath Gohain Barua (1871-1946), a contemporary of Lakshminath Bezbarua, wrote four historical plays, Jaymati (1900), Gadadhar (1907), Sadhani (1910) and Lachit Barphukan (1915). The last play is on the famous Ahom general who defeated the Mughal forces in the battle of Saraighat. These verse plays are interesting not so much as drama but as projection of the history of Assam. They also showed a want of economy, excessive sentimentality and prolix dialogues in the romantic vein. However, his most successful play, Gaon burdha, perhaps, is a social play.

A contemporary of Padmanath Gohain Barua is Benudhar Rajkhowa who wrote some light social comedies, and other plays based on religious themes and 'puranic' legends. Some of his plays are Seuti kirn, Lakhimi tirota and Topanir parinam.

Chandradhar Barua's Meghnad badh (1904) and Tilottoma sambhav are in blank verse. Barua used blank verse, perhaps under the influence of the Bengali play Meghnad badh.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Durgeswar Sarma's Partho parajoy (1919) and Bali badh (1912) were popular with the audience. He also wrote Chandravali and Padmavati, adapting Shakepeare's As You Like It and Cymbeline respectively.

Ambikagiri Roychoudhury too wrote plays on historical and religious themes. His romanticism can be seen at its best in his poetry. He also wrote plays in verse which was the accepted medium for the stage. A fascination for the past is yet another aspect of his romanticism. His Jaydrath badh and Bhakta Gaurav were highly successful plays on the stage.

Padmadhar Chaliha became established as a dramatist in the second half of this century. As a leading actor of Sibsagar-natya Samaj, he took a leading part in the theatre movement. His Amar lila is a successful rendering of Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet.

There were many other dramatists who showed romantic traits in their works. Mitradev Mahanta Adhikar wrote comic plays; Sailodhar Rajkhowa translated Shakespeare and also wrote plays on historical and religious themes. From the second half of this century, Atulchandra Hazarika and Jyotiprasad Agarwala started writing. Both of them can be seen as part of the earlier romantic movement. Atulchandra Hazarika was a prolific writer who reduced the dependence of Assamese theatre groups on Bengali drama. Joytiprasad Agarwala is best known for his plays, such as Sonit Kunwari and Karengar ligiri. They demonstrate his talents in the dramatic form which is essentially romantic. Sonit Kunwari shows the supernatural world of myth, while Karengar ligiri is an outstanding play which re-examines the romantic credo. Though very much in the romantic tradition, it is remarkable for its dramatic presentation of a situation and conflicting viewpoints. This play is about an individual's rebellion in a traditional feudal society. Sundar, the protagonist of the play, is a perfect romantic hero who wants to break all social taboos and conventions. Joytiprasad, however, highlights the limitations of such a romantic rebellion, while retaining at the same time our sympathy with its upsurge.

Jyotiprasad can be considered the last great dramatist in the romantic tradition. He died in 1951, and by that time contemporary movements in theatre and drama began influencing the dramatists in Assam.

Aso.B.

ROMANTICISM (Bengali). It was during the second half of the nineteenth century that many features of European romanticism began to be discernible in Bengali literature. A memorable use of derivative from the basic word 'Romantic' occurs in a later volume of Rabindranath Tagore:

They call me a Romantik
I accept that appellation, being a pilgrim to the holy seat of Rasa;
My garment
I have coloured, my dear. (Nava jatak)

A front-rank poet of today, Subhas Mukhopadhyaya, has used the word in its English form in one of his poems:

Let the poem that I plan to compose today contain in every line the modern tune.
Breaking down narrow limits
Embracing the whole world,
Our airplanes, flying, nurture
New romance.

In the poem of Subhas Mukhopadhyaya, the poet's imagination looks forward to the days to come; for him, life must not remain static in the quagmire of the past; for him, life is a continually moving process, moving towards the future. This perception is contrary to that of another brand of romantic poets who experience thrills in the past 'old, unhappy, far-off things'. In the objectivist concept, life is external to the viewer, but life can also have a subjective aspect which we can discern in the viewer's personality. This subjectivity comes out in Rabindranath's poem; speaking of life, the poet says:

Much of it, I know, is illusory
And much is mine own shadow,
Yet, when you ask,'call you this Real?'
'Never,' say I, 'I am a Romantik.'

Bounded by its basic subjectivity and objectivity, romanticism with its manifold features cannot, indeed, be exactly defined.

The wave of romanticism which had been passing over western Europe since the later decades of the eighteenth century, touched Bengal during the earlier quarters of the nineteenth century. The name of Henry Vivian Louis Derozio stands at the head of the youthful Indo-English writers. Apart from Derozio, notable among others, were Kashiprasad Ghose, Michael Madhusudan Dutt, and the two sisters Toru and Aru Dutt. Derozio has been linked with Keats, but a more plausible link is Byron, since Derozio, like Byron, wrote in English romantic verse-tales. Kashiprasad Ghose's first publication, The Shair and Other Poems (1830), noticed in several British literary journals, was also in English. Another Bengali poet was Rajnarain Dutt, the author of a Byronic verse-tale, Osmyn, an Arabic Tale (1841). Several cousins in the Dutt family wrote poems in English and a volume, the Dutt family Album, was published in 1870. Toru's own poetical work, apart from her A Sheaf Gleaned in French Fields, 1876 (a collection of her translations from various French poets), was Ancient Ballads and Legends of Hindustan, poems on ancient Indian ideals which she contemplates in her wistful romantic manner.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The outstanding Bengali poet of the middle decades of the nineteenth century was Michael Madhusudan Dutt who too began his career as a poet writing verses in English, though soon he veered round to Bengali. In the 1840s, Michael wrote a number of poems, short lyrics as well as fairly long narratives, in English which are typical examples of romantic art, both lyrical and narrative. Upsori, an uncompleted poem in Spenserian stanzas, is full of echoes from Keats's The Eve of St. Agnes. The Captive Ladie, another verse tale in English, is occasionally tinged with the spirit of Byron's Giaour and Tom Moore's Lala Rookh. After such and other works Michael transferred his creative energy from the English to the Bengali medium and this shift proved a major event in the history of Bengali poetry, since it was a shift from a foreign language to an Indian language.

Michael's choice of heroic stories and legends for his verse tales indicated his romantic temperament. This temperament was mingled with a knowledge of, and admiration for, classical European poetry. Thus, the organisation of events, situations and characters in his epical works is close to the organisation of form in European epics, as his knowledge of Homer, Virgil, Tasso and Milton brought him closer to the European model of the epic than to the Indian, although the principal source of his major tale was Valmiki's Ramayana. There are scenes and episodes in Michael's Meghanad badh kavya which testify to his basically romantic temper. Such narrative poems as Tilottama sambhava kavya and Meghanad badh kavya too have been planned and composed in the technique of the great epics. The imagination of this powerful poet, whose own young student days brought him into contact with contemporary English poetry, was however essentially romantic, and this romantic slant is writ large on most of his works. Especially, the lyrically conceived and presented Brajangana kavya is modelled on the great medieval poet Jayadeva's, and also the musician Madhukar's, deeply emotive poetry dealing with the perennially romantic love story of Krishna and Radha.

Two features of Michael's career are of high significance in a study of Bengali literary history: (a) With Michael's rejection of English as the medium of his creative writing, the Bengali language became the sole medium of Bengali poetry, and (b) Romanticism emerged as the predominant quality in Bengali literature.

Established by Michael Madhusudan Dutt as the central aesthetic quality of Bengali poetry, Romanticism continued through the works of Michael's contemporaries. Rangalal Banerjee's (1826-86) Padmini upakhyan, published in 1858, is a narrative romance of which the historical source is Tod's Annals of Rajasthan. Rangalal's Karmadevi (1862) and Surasundari (1868) are his other narrative romances. The poet's interest in narrative romances continues till Kanchi Kaveri (1879) of which the story is based on a romantic tale of Orissa.

Two other well-known poets of the second half of the century were Hemchandra Banerjee (1838-1903) and Nabinchandra Sen (1846-1909). Hemchandra was deeply influenced by Byron and his poetical attempt in Chinta tarangini (Stream of thoughts) testifies to his passion for introspective flow. His Britra samhar, an epic type poem, was very popular with contemporary readers by virtue of its central theme—the self-sacrifice of Dadhichi, the holy sage. As poetry, however, the work fails to capture the imagination of the modern reader; nor is there any impressive element of romantic perception. This was the period (1874) when a minor poet, Ishanchandra Banerjee, translated into Bengali verse the eighteenth century English poet Thomas Parnell's well-known work The Hermit. The translation, however, failed to bring out the romantic elements in the poem.

Nabinchandra Sen (1846-1909) was a strong exponent of the newly emerging Indian patriotism, tinged with Romanticism.

His Palashir yuddha (The battle of Plassey) is a remarkable example of romanticism and patriotism intertwined, and its fervent appeal to the Indians to rise to freedom still continues to thrill the reader. Curiously after the success of this poem, Nabinchandra turned his attention to subjects dealing with Krishna, Buddha, Christ and Chaitanya.

If the reputation of these poets has become somewhat dim today it is because they did not possess either the strong narrative imagination of Michael Madhusudan or his spontaneous lyricism. The pure lyricism of Madhusudan's Brajangana kavya appealed to a large section of Bengali poets of the rising generation whose works earned some reputation during the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Prominent among these poets were Biharilal Chakravarti, Dwijendranath Tagore, Ishanchandra Banerjee (poet Hemchandra's brother and author of Yogesh, a household romance in verse), Akshoychandra Chaudhuri (who also translated into Bengali Thomas Parnell's The Hermit), Akshoychandra Baral (the talented author of Pradeep and Esha, the latter an impressive elegy on his wife's death), Govindachandra Das, a poet of rural life and sensibility, Surendranath Majumdar (an admirer of Biharilal) who glorified woman as mother, sister and wife, Devendranath Sen (1855-1920), a prominent poet of his time and a competent sonneteer, sensitive to the beauty of plant-life, whose admiration for woman and child lends a special impressiveness to his poetry. These poets were gifted with romantic admiration for womanhood and childhood, respect for mystical aspects of nature and life's elemental values and the thrill of imaginative sensibility.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Dwijendranath Tagore (1840-1926), the eldest brother of Rabindranath Tagore and a man whose genius touched manifold aspects of life, possessed high literary gifts and translated Kalidasa's Meghaduta into Bengali. He edited the famous Bengali literary journal, Bharati, for the first seven years of its currency and wrote a long poem, Swapna prayan (The Dream departure), a profound work of romantic symbolism which Rabindranath described as 'a palace of allegory'. This work is important in a consideration of Romanticism in Bengali literature on account of its employment of dream as an inalienable element of aesthetic vision. The dream idea has been linked with the allegorical imterpretation of Prayan. A friend of Dwijendranath Tagore was Biharilal Chakravarti whose talent was lyrical and who earned fame as the author of Sarada mangal (1879), a symbolic poem revealing the tense romantic imagination of the poet. The imaginative visions of Dwijendranath Tagore and Biharilal Chakrabarty drew some sustenance from western visionary poets such as Dante, Milton and Goethe.

The second half of the nineteenth century witnessed the genesis of the art of the novel in Bengali literature and it turned out to be an art hospitable in some of its forms, especially in the form of the historical fiction, to romantic values and attitudes. The earliest instance of the novel in the language was work by Pyarichand Mitra entitled Alaler gharer dulal (the pampered son of a childless family, 1855). The work is realistic, critical and sarcastic rather than romantic and imaginative. After some crude attempts in the form of fiction (e.g. Kaliprasanna Singh's Hutom penchar naksha, 1862) and Bhubenchandra Mukherjee's adaptation of an English work, Reynolds' Mysteries of London), there came Bankimchandra Chatterjee (1838-94), one of the greatest writers and thinkers of Bengal. Bankim, like Madhusudan Dutt, started his creative career with a work in English, Rajmohan's Wife (1864). Bankim, however, quickly realised the suitability of the Bengali medium for his literary aspirations, and thereafter stuck to his own language for his creative work. He wrote a number of novels on a variety of themes and patterns and, in addition, wrote powerful prose in critical essays in serious and witty styles.

Of Bankim's fourteen novels, the early ones which brought him widespread fame, were Durgesh-nandini (1865), Kapal kundala (1866) and Mrinalini (1869), and these works are essentially romantic by virtue of the context of time and place within which the stories have been placed. The situation in Durgesh-nandini reminds the reader of a comparable situation in Sir Walter Scott's Ivanhoe, although Bankim himself said that he had not read Scott's work before writing Durgesh-nandini. Nevertheless, in this novel, Romance has been projected through a dominant sense of bygone times. In Kapal kundala too, there is a remoteness and an overhanging mysticism in the environment of the whole story. Romance assumes a variety of forms in accord with the environmental set-up of historical time and place of the story. Preponderance of the romantic element is also noticeable in Chandrasekhar, Anandamath, Devi Chaudhurani, Sitaram and Raj Sinha. Bankim himself said that prior to writing the novel, he had never written any historical novel; this was his first effort. With modesty, Bankim said that this attempt at a historical romance was not wholly successful, but Rabindranath Tagore had a different estimation of the novel: 'Each part of the novel flows with the rapidity of a fountain...in part seven we see partly a river's flow, partly the billows of a sea... partly the vast expanse of history and partly the agonised cry of a sinking boat; the dance there is furious and the events spread from the terminus of a historical age to another.' This romance of the passage of time manifests itself in another manner in Anandamath: the novel has contributed the great song 'Vande-Mataram'—the song and the slogan to Indian nationalism. This novel, Anandamath, praised by such contemporaries as R.C.Dutt and Bipin Chandra Pal, stands sui generis in literary history, by virtue of its elevating admixture of idealism, romantic pursuit of freedom, and consciousness of the sufferings caused by famine. Bankimchandra's many-sided creative talent embracing both romance and reality are intermingled in Anandamath.

Bankimchandra's works gave a fillip to the category of romantic fiction in Bengali. Thus Pratapchandra Ghosh, a scholarly person, wrote the Bangadhip parajay, a work crowded with historical facts which, however, have not risen to the level of romantic and imaginative art. Two successful novelists were Chandicharan Sen, translator of Uncle Tom's Cabin and author of historical tales such as Maharaj Nandkumar and Jhansir Rani, both patriotic works but not works of high imaginative power. Nagendranath Gupta's Amar Singha (1889) is deficient in imaginative power. Superior works of historical fiction were produced by Rameshchandra Dutt of the Indian Civil Service. His meritorious historical works are Banga vijeta, Madhavi kankan, Maharashtra jiwan prabhat, and Rajput jivan sandhya.

By now we have arrived at the Rabindra Yug, the Age of Rabindranath, an Age during which in both form and content, Romanticism in Bengali literature acquired an infinite variety. Romanticism is present in all varieties of Rabindranath's work - poetry (lyrical, descriptive, narrative, metaphysical); prose (stories, full-length fiction, brief sketches, essays); drama (allegorical, symbolical, lyrical, historical, imaginative), and other mixed varieties. And this Romanticism, some times emotional and sometimes metaphysical and symbolic, adopts different shapes and forms at different periods of his creative life. Perhaps the richest accumulation of Romantic vision in poetry occurs in Balaka where, in the poem addressed to Emperor Shah Jahan, the poet calls the Taj Mahal 'a drop of bright white tear down the cheeks of time', an image that raises the reader's sensibility to an unending metaphysical perception.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

There is even profounder metaphysics in the poem addressed to the River; if the River halts even for a moment

> At once the universe will quake > in all its mountains of materials, > and even the minutest molecule > will be struck down by corruption's pain.

The concepts of life and death, motion and immobility, onward motion and backward halt, assume in Rabindranath's poetry a variety of symbolistic figures which are at once intensely romantic in their lineaments and profoundly metaphysical in their significance.

Again, Rabindranath's unique gift for investing the commonplace with profound significance reveals itself in several poems, one of which is entitled 'Hariey Ja-o-a' (Getting Lost): my little girl, says the poet, was going down the stairs with a lighted candle in hand when suddenly the light went out and the child wailed and the father rushed to her and asked 'what's the matter?'; the child replied 'I am lost'. And to the poet's imagination, the child's feeling of loss in surrounding darkness is symbolic of all living creatures' potential sense of getting lost. Only the romantic imagination of Rabindranath could raise so trivial a situation as the child's cry to so profoundly universal a significance. A similarly romantic situation is indicated in the sonnet 'Rakhi purnima' (Mohua) in which a horse-riding visitor at night halted at the door, but with no effort to declare himself he left for his mysterious destination. This poem is, perhaps, subtler and quieter than Walter de la Mare's The Listeners.

Rabindranath's romanticism sometimes invests the commonplace and the trivial with uncommon beauty; an example can be found in 'Samabyathi' (Shishu) in which a little boy says to his mother: "If, O Mother, I were a puppy and not your son, would you stop me from picking some food from your plate; would you say, wherefrom has this wretched little dog come here? Get away, you little dog : Tell me, mother, what you would say: If this be what you would say, put me down from your lap, mother, I would take no food from your plate." This is romantic imagination that invests the commonplace with the beauty of the multi-coloured uncommon.

In European literature of the early nineteenth century, the supernatural became an important element of Romanticism. Thus, Coleidge's work, Mary Shelley's work, Charles Lamb's vision of 'Dream-Children' romanicise dreams. The Gothic romances of Mrs. Radcliffe, Matthew Gregory Lewis and Charles Maturin were well-known romances, known even in the nineteenth century Bengal. In Rabindranath's memorable story, 'Kshudhita pashan' (The Hungry Stones), the author (story-teller) passes through a shivering experience of hearing heart-breaking wailings of a supernatural voice. In the story we experience the tremor of Gothic horror. A scholar has said, 'The fear of the ghost is the fear of the unknown', and that mystic fear receives a subtle treatment in Rabindranth's great novel, Chaturanga. In chapter ten of this novel, when Shacheesh is sleeping, he wakes up hearing some noise of flapping wings in the cabin as though some antediluvian creature is moving about. He feels the primeval creature's breathing on his chilled body and then this loathsome creature pressed its body down on him before leaving the cabin, leaving behind him sounds of repressed weeping. A different treatment (no less terror-smitten) is in a story called 'The golden stag' in which a greedy chaser after gold locks up a boy in an underground cell to die there to be converted into ghost and to keep watch over the hidden gold.

To whichever genre, form and theme of creative literature Rabindranath Tagore set his hands, he acquired perfection.

The romantic imagination distinguished the creative work of Abanindranath Tagore as well. That imagination had left its unmistakable marks not only on his famous paintings and sketches but also on his literary creations. A considerable proportion of his writings—especially Marubir punthi, Chainburos punthi, and Bhut patir desh—are delightful examples of the serio-comic effects of the tales of fantasy.

With Rabindranath Tagore's death in 1941 at the age of eighty, there was a break in the history of Bengali literature. Changes had already been noticeable after World War I during the twenties. Vigorous changes in western literature had already been introduced and achieved by T.S. Eliot, Ezra Pound and Aldous Huxley. A new school of novelists (including Andre Gide, Anatole France, D.H. Lawrence, Virginia Woolf, James Joyce) and other developments in European fiction began to influence the novelistic ideas of many Bengali writers some of whom had already found new ideologies and new angles of vision in their own homelands. The changing attitudes and ideologies were strongly felt by a generation of writers who were closely linked with a number of literary journals, especially Kallol (the period has come to be known as the Kallol-yug), Kali Kalam, Pragati, Dhupchaya, Parichay, Chaturanga and others. With Kazi Nazrul Islam, there was an outburst of new poetry; Mohitlal Majumdar made a powerful impact on the world of letters, and in the works of both poets, Nazrul and Mohitlal, modernity is identical with romanticism, romanticism that turns the reader's attention to far off lands and far-away events and legends. With Nazrul we go to Mesopotamia and Shat-al-Arab; Mohit Majumdar leads us to the days of Jahangir and Nur Jahan and from there to the Upanishadic world of Nachiketa. We follow Jibananand Das to the world of the late medieval Bengal (the Bengal of Srimanta the merchant, Mukundaram the poet, and the horse-riding Ray Rayun), wandering over several areas of history and geography.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Premendra Mitra leads us to the North pole and the South pole and the Pacific islands, and Buddhadeva Bose guides us to the kingdoms of ancient India as well as to the shadowy resurgent Africa. And Subhas Mukhopadhaya leads us to the spectacle of a public procession in today's Calcutta where faces quickly disappear and yet the vision remains:

> The face disappeared in the maidan concourse,
> It glowed like phosphorus
> At the frothy top of the crowd.

Here is a common sight of today's Calcutta city elevated to the brightness of a romantic vision.

Premendra Mitra, at once a novelist, a short-story writer and a poet in one-of his poems transforms the commonplace to the uncommon;

> I am the poet of blacksmiths, of carpenters, > of workers, of load-bearers;
> I am the poet of the bottom-grade workers.
> I am the poet, O brothers, of labour and sweat,
> I have no time, O brother, to spare
> For comfort-whelmed feelings and dreams.

The romantic imagination of the Bengali poet elevates the commonplace of another kind to supra-terrestrial beauty. When the Queen of the Universe takes off one ornament after another and the dense night descends on the three worlds, at that time the poet stands alone.

> And the universe floats to an unknown destination
> Beyond heaven and earth and Inferno.
> I look and feel sleepy. (Virendra Chattopadhaya)

The Romantic imagination is no less deeply impressed on recent Bengali fiction than on recent Bengali poetry. One remembers the paragraph in Sarat Chatterjee's Shrikanta (Part I) which described the hero seated in one corner of burning ground in the midst of hair-raising supernatural sounds. One also remembers Tarasankar Bandhyopadhyaya's Jalsaghar which presents the final situation of a new-decadent zamindar family, a story which leads us back to contrasted past times, or, in another novel of Tarasankar, Kalindi, the village of that name, reminds us of Hardy's Egdon Heath in The Return of the Native. The romantic creation of a supernatural atmosphere, something far more infinitely refined than crude horror-stories, has prevailed in Bengali fiction for many decades. Manoj Basu's collections of stories in Bana marmar and Jatismar present memorable treatments of the supernatural. In the post-Tagore period, intensely romanticised treatments of the world of imagination occur in Bibhuti Bandyopadhyay's great triology, Pather panchali, Aparajita, and Apur Samsar. And thus the tide of the romantic imagination flows on in Bengali literature even though many of the contemporary writers would wish it away.

A.B.

ROMANTICISM (Dogri). Romanticism never developed as a movement in Dogri literature, but it has always been a strong streak in the spectrum of Dogri poetry. There is a very large number of Dogri folk-songs which can be classified as 'romantic'. Many Dogri poets have written poems and songs which come under the trend of romanticism. Among the earlier poets of 1940's, while Kishan Smailpuri, Parmanand Almast and Yash Sharma carried forward the Dogra folk-romantic tradition in their songs (contained in Jago Duggar, late 1940's), Dinubhai Pant endowed his herioc balled 'Vir Gulab' with romantic atmosphere. Four of the nine stories of Pehala phul by Bhagwatprasad Sathe are in a sense romantically treated legends. This streak continued during the 1950's, as seen not only in the works of Kishan Smailpuri, Parmanand Almast, Yash Sharma and Dinubhai Pant, but also in some of the poems of Ramnath Shastri and ghazals of Vedpal Deep. Among the poets of 1950's, Onkar Singh, Kehari Singh, Madhukar and Padma show a romantic approach to their subjects, be it description of hills and belles, or emotion of love for or separation from the beloved. This approach, marked by a little sentimentalism and idealism, is also visible in short stories and plays including one-act and radio plays written during this period, especially the stories of D.C. Prashant and Narendra Khajura, and plays like Bawa jitto and Devaka janam. Among the poets of 1960's, while Ramlal Sharma and Charan Singh are predominantly romantic, Mohanlal Sapolia, Piyush Guleri and Gautam Vyathit show a romantic bent in the treatment of their subjects. D.C.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Prashant's stories of the decade are mostly romantic, while some stories of Narendra Khajuria and Madanmohan Sharma show traces of romantic approach. In the seventies and eighties while one sees a greater element of realism in Dogri poetry, prose, fiction and drama, one also comes across a lot of romantic stuff in the old romantic tradition and mould, particularly songs and ghazals and even fiction of the newcomers. A prominent romantic poet thrown up by the decade is Jitendra Udhampuri, who got the Sahitya Akademi Award for his fourth publication, Ek shahar yaden da, for the year 1981.

Sh.

ROMANTICISM (English). Following the battle of Plassey in 1757 the anglicisation of India came quite quickly with the beginning of a renaissance in Indian thought in the 1770s or 1780s. The anglicisation included a knowledge of the English language which in its turn provided a knowledge of the western intellectual and cultural tradition. Fort William College, opened in 1800, increased the Indian interest in the acquisition of the English language and education, and the Hindu College, founded in 1817, developed this interest further. It was quite natural for a student of Hindu College to write original verses in English, and during the 1830s several Indian poets appeared. The resident English had been occasionally writing poetry, but it was written more or less in the manner in which much of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century verses were produced at home and the Indians who followed them turned the manner into a tradition. This early Indo-English poetry demonstrated the typical characteristics of the English Romantic poets who wrote towards the end of the eighteenth century and in the early years of the nineteenth. This English Romantic poetry, later divided into two or more phases, had influenced the Indian poets most. It should now be assumed that Romanticism in Indo-English poetry dates from the middle of the third decade in the nineteenth century. English Romanticism had also produced in its earlier and later phases romantic novels and plays with tales of wonder and adventure, the Gothic romances and strange, fanciful and, sometimes, violent stories. The plot and its ingredients in such novels and plays were frequently repulsive and disapproved by society at large but as fiction the literary works had a very large appeal for the English reading public. When the Indo-English authors turned their hand to the writing of novels and dramas English Romanticism appeared in an Indian guise, as it did in the early Indo-English poetry.

Henry Louis Vivien Derozio (1809-1831) had the contemporary English poets for his models. His poems in general had genuine feelings without sentimentality and his long poem, The Fakeer of Jungheera, which shows his affinity with Byron, used different metres for the changing temper in the narrative. Kashiprasad Ghose's simple love lyrics with moralisings struck the first note of Indianness. Michael Madhusudan Dutt exhibited a better technical competence, but was mainly influenced by Scott and Byron and partly by Milton. Rajnarain Dutt, Shoshee Chunder Dutt and Hur Chunder Dutt produced pure imitations of the Romantics. Ram Sharma (Nobokissen Ghose) expressed mystical experience in a conventional form, B.M.Malabari was purely imitative, and Romesh Chunder Dutt's translations of the Indian epics were technically competent but without the epic sense and feeling.

The second phase of the Indo-English literature began after the events of 1857 and the Indian poetry in English reached its first recognisable identity. The Dutt Family Album (1870), however, failed to exhibit a real achievement and signs of a substantial advance upon the earlier literary achievement. The only significant poet during the early years in this phase had been Toru Dutt who wrote her best romantic poems dealing with the old Indian life, nature and nostalgia. Manmohan Ghose displayed a delight in nature and intense love of beauty. The English translations of Rabindranath Tagore's Gitanjali, The Gardener and The Crescent Moon expressed the same mystical romanticism adjusted to the post-renaissance Indian tradition in poetry, a personal quest for the divine in various moods and a great variety of forms. Similar form of romanticism, is noticeable in Sri Aurobindo's early poetry, and the mystical romanticism which first appears in it, later matures into a long philosophical meditation. His early poetry reflected the twilight of the English 1890s and his later poems written after his return to India showed a mystical awareness with emotional intensity and technical innovation. His Savitri turned this mystical awareness into a philosophical mysticism and intricate symbolism.

Sarojini Naidu followed the earlier poets in creating an evocative music with words and representing striking scenes from life and Nature. With the beginning of the Gandhian age in Indian politics in 1920, romanticism in Indo-English poetry stooped into twilight with its derivativeness, imitation and superficiality of decadence, as seen in the works of numerous poets writing mostly before the Indian Independence. Perhaps the same political and social awakening that encouraged the growth of the Indian English fiction weighed on the genius of poetry. The characteristic tendencies of Indo-English literature after Independence are markedly different from the traits during the early stages of the Indian renaissance and also from the types belonging to the period immediately preceding Independence. A large number of poets, who began publishing since the 1950's, stand out with an identity that is significant even for the present. Though the poets have been concerned with an examination of the individual's place in society and the nature of society the individual has to live in, the undercurrent of romantic emotion appears in their product in various degrees. A.K. Ramanujan, R. Parthasarathy and Arun Kolatkar consider the problem of roots, and the nostalgic aspects of a community and communality, recalling early childhood and familial memories, analysing the strength and weaknesses of the native heritage, and delineating the ossification in a religious tradition as well as in a rigid scientific and industrial society. Under such preoccupations one discovers at times the nostalgic treatment given to the subject and the accompanying longing of romantic poetry, though the emphasis on nostalgia and longing differs from poet to poet. The intensity of feeling makes Nissim Ezekiel sensitive to the usual social response to evil and suffering; it tempts Adil Jussawala into viewing society as a compassionate onlooker and Gieve Patel into accepting his place in society; it turns K.N. Daruwalla into a satirist 'with bile and acid', and makes Dom Moraes a poet at the very centre of human predicament. Such a view of the individual and his environment has made the poets look into themselves and turned their poetry highly personal and confessional. Shiv Kumar tries to describe the intense emotion, Kamala Das broods over the unlimited hunger tearing at the conventions, Jayanta Mahapatra reflects on personal and social landscape, P.Lal in his earlier poetry celebrates beauty, Pritish Nandy infuses into his work verbal vigour, and A.K. Mehrotra indulges into a surreal vision. Part of this poetry, perhaps, still belongs to the Romantic tradition though the poets have been continually developing an independent vision and expression.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Among the poets currently producing significant work within the tradition of Indo-English poetry and making a variety of experiments with thought and form, are Dilip Chitre, Shankar Mokashi-Punekar, Deba Patnaik, Saleem Peeradina, Srinivas Rayaprol and Gopal Honnalgre. A large number of modern women poets favour a lyrical design within the range of the free verse. Monika Varma is a poet of Nature and her poetry describes various objects and scenes from nature with a metaphysical view of life as a whole. Sujatha Modayil is concerned with pain, suffering and poverty in society expressed lyrically. Kamala Das and Gauri Deshpande explore the experience of love with great immediacy and intimacy. Suniti Namjoshi and Mamta Kalia reveal passionate love, Eunice de Sousa describes nostaligic childhood and home life, and Margaret Chatterjee has love as the central focus in her poetry.

The romantic tendency may be discovered in the first Indo-English play, The Persecuted (1831) by Krishna Mohan Banerji, followed by the The First Parsi Baronet (1866) in verse by C.S. Nazir. The Indo-English drama, however, did not come into development until the turn of the century when Sri Aurobindo, as it seems to us today, appeared as its first major voice. A number of plays were written at the beginning of the century or earlier, but Sri Aurobindo shows himself in all his plays the same romantic, mystical and philosophical writer. The second significant dramatist is T.P. Kailasam whose subjects are taken from the epics, and the plays take the audience to the world of romances. Harindranath Chattopadhyaya, well-known as a poet in the tradition of Toru Dutt, Monmohan Ghose and Sri Aurobindo, with his romantic and philosophical speculations in verse, comes next in line writing plays on social, historical and devotional subjects, but in them one may detect at times a note of symbolism. The larger concern in drama, however, centres round society and the individual's relation to it, though we have a number of plays which deal with history, politics, religion, mythology and association between the East and the West. In addition to them there are plays which present particularly the psychological problems of the individual in a typically psychological setting. For their medium the playwrights have employed both verse and prose in their plays. Irrespective of the subject and medium, prose and verse, the dramatists have continually displayed, and are still displaying, an undercurrent of a great deal of feeling in their plays, as almost any play written whether by Asif Currimbhoy, Santha Rama Rau, P. Chakravarty, Kamala Das, Nissim Ezekiel, K.M. Srinivas Gowda, Pratap Sharma, V.D. Trivedi or Vera Sharma, sixty years ago or this very year, demonstrates. The romantic element, predominant from the early decades of the last century till Independence, has now been replaced largely with an increasing concern for the environment around the characters in the dramas. The emphasis still remains, as in the earlier plays, on the characters, but the playwrights do not indulge in effusions.

In Indo-English fiction the romantic element appears with the first two fictional works, Kylash Chunder Dutt's A Journal of 45 Hours of the Year 1945, a fantasy published in 1835, narrating an imaginary unsuccessful revolt against the British a hundred years later, and Shoshee Chunder Dutt's Republic of Orissa : Annals from the Pages of the Twentieth Century (1845) relating an imaginary British defeat and the foundation of a republic in Orissa in the second decade of the twentieth century. With the first proper Indo-English novel, Bankimchandra Chatterjee's Rajmohan's Wife (1864), which told a social story with melodrama, a certain kind of romantic fiction was created and generations of novelists followed the practice. The melodrama and poor romantic verbalness, however, disqualify them as proper novels. but reading them now in the order of their publication one is able to see the development of a fictional mode with a parallel development in the use of the English language.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The tradition of the nineteenth-century Indo-English fiction radically altered in the third decade of this century with the emergence of three very significant novelists, Mulk Raj Anand, R.K. Narayan and Raja Rao, with quite a few others who were all interested in society, politics and history. Romanticism even in its poor, loose form was now gone. Instead, we see compassion in Anand and K.S. Venkataramani, lyrical sympathy in K. Nagarjuna and Dhan Gopal Mukherjee, a blending of lyricism and the comic in R.K. Narayan, patriotic zeal in K.A. Abbas, Amir Ali, C.N. Zutshi and N.S. Phadke, and a lyricism against the background of nature in Humayun Kabir. Compassion, lyricism, the importance of love, the conflict between an industrial society and the rural life, the destruction of the traditional way of life and its values and the decaying of historical and cultural heritage are also the chosen subjects of the novelists who began writing after Independence and are still continuing to write. Ruth Prawer Jhabwala's compassionate view of the Indian home life, Kamala Markandaya's lyrical mood even for the poorest village home, Khushwant Singh's juxtaposition of the serious and the comic with the undercurrent of a gentle feeling, and Nayantara Saghal's delineations with feminine charm amounting to fantasy and lyricism are significant attitudes in the current phase of Indo-English fiction. M. Malgaonkar's romantic fascination with the horrific and with the contrast between the historical past and the historical present, Bhabani Bhattacharya's variations upon an analysis of feelings altering with situation and mood, G.V. Desani's reworking of the typical romantic hero and Kamala Das's repressed fantasy find their expression in the novel today. It is, indeed, difficult to classify this fictional work under a particular label.

Sh.Ba.

ROMANTICISM (Gujarati). Many poetic works of the medieval period have the ingredients of romanticism, though its literary concept travelled much later to India from the West.

Narmad (1833-1886) was the pioneer of the romantic trend in Gujarati literature. He broke the old literary traditions, introduced new forms, brought changes in the content of the works and paved the way for the introduction of the western concept of romanticism in Gujarati literature.

The noteworthy aspect of Kant's (1867-1923) khandkavyas is his depiction of nature at its worst and at its best. Kaka Kalelkar was a great lover of nature and his aesthetic sense is at its best when he finds himself close to mother nature. Apart from his masterpiece, Himalayano pravas, he rides a parabola in Jivan-no anand and Jivan-lila, and takes the reader into the mystery of beauty that lies hidden in the foot prints of sand spread all along the seashore, and in the stones and boulders on the mountains. At this point the reader shares the unadulterated joy that the sea, the sky, the rivers and mountains offer to the poet.

Tribhuvan Gaurishankar Vyas (1888-1975) has also written some poems portraying the beauty of nature and the majesty of seasons. In many of his poems, Sundarji Betai (b.1904) loves to view nature as a backdrop to human emotions, and enjoys its various forms and moods.

Prahlad Parekh (1912-1962), essentially a poet of lyrical talent, portrays nature in its raw and naked form. His poetry is saturated with colours, sounds and fragrance. He makes use of the metaphors sensibly and absorbs the 'abstract' in such a way that it comes flickering down before the senses. For him the darkness emits aroma and the stars fragrance; and he feels that the murmur of the sea transports soul to its natural serenity. In line with Parekh stands Rajendra Shah (b.1913), a poet of love, beauty, nature and mystical experiences. His sojourn in the realms of beauty brings him the realisation of his identification with the fundamental unity of the universe. Ushanas (b.1920) in his poems talks of the fragrance of an unknown flower blossoming on an unknown tree somewhere on earth or in the skies; he marvels at the colours of the seasons and the splendour of the galaxy, and tries to explore the mystery of nature.

Romanticism reached its peak during the modern period in Gujarati literature and ebbed away in the post-modern era when the poets brought realism in their poetic works and depicted the hard realities of life.

C.M.

ROMANTICISM (Hindi)
See under CHHAYAVAD

ROMANTICISM (Kannada). The term 'Romanticism' is normally associated with the Navodaya Age in modern Kannada poetry, but the elements of romanticism can be found in old Kannada poetry as well.

Even in a predominantly classical poet like Pampa (10th c.) it is evident in his love of 'deshi' which gives his lofty style a touch of the spoken idiom. However, romanticism found its full expression in the lyrical outburst of the 'vachanas' in the twelfth century. Vachana created a new form of poetry completely different from the classical narrative tradition. It gave spontaneous expression to an intensely personal experience. In Basavanna, the conflict between an intense yearning for the 'beyond' and inherent human weakness is expressed with transparent honesty in a wide range of imagery and intimate tone. Akka Mahadevi excels even Basavanna in lyrical effusion. In her, 'bhakti' turns into love-relationship between man and God and her vachanas are beautiful love-lyrics. Her intense passion and ecstasy of union are realised in her visionary dreams.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Vachanas had a great liberating influence on the subsequent poets. Raghavanka broke away from the rigid classical mould of the 'champu' form and classical Sanskrit metres and wrote his epics in native metres, but he is still classical by temperament. Harihara, on the other hand, was out and out a romantic. His exuberant spirit found its true expression in his 'ragale'. The descriptions of bhakti in his saint heroes, reveals his romantic exuberance and emotional ecstasy.

Romanticism found another great poet in Kumaravyasa (15th c.). Krishna is the hero of his epic, but he is intensely human. Every character is marked by intensity of passion. The spontaneous power of his imagination is evident everywhere, especially in his rich imagery. In his intimate style, the story of the Mahabharata loses its remoteness and becomes the story of our neighbours.

The elements of romanticism appeared in the songs of the Haridasas, in the Virashaiva mystic poets and in Shisunal Shareef also. Even during the classical revival, romanticism was not completely absent. The famous 'shringara' episodes in Ratnakaravarni's (16th c.) Bharatesha vaibhava are typically romantic. So is the framework of Muddana's Ramashwamedha (1898) in which the poet and his wife comment on the story.

But the word 'Romanticism' appeared with all its Western connotation only in modern poetry and became a creed. The trend was set by B.M. Shree's English gitagalu (1921), a translation of English romantic poems, which went well with the spirit of the time and at once appealed to the imagination of the writers and the readers. There was a sudden burst of creative energy. Bendre, K.V. Puttappa, P.T. Narasimhachar, K.S. Narasimhaswamy, V.K. Gokak, Rajaratnam and several others wrote poems. Wordsworth, Shelley and Keats became their models. Typical romantic concerns like love, nature and its relation to man, love of the past, belief in the other world, tendency towards mysticism and the cult of feeling began to appear. There is also in common a lofty conception of poetry, belief in the power of the imagination, and a concern with poetic language and with the relationship of the real to the ideal.

But there are important differences, too. Nature for the Kannada poets was not just a return to the natural and the simple or a refuge for spiritual solace, but it was also a manifestation of the divine. Love was not just the romantic Platonic love, but also conjugal love with all its joys and sorrows. Interest in folk-poetry was not confined to the revival of folk forms, but it moulded the very expression of poets like Bendre. Thus, the impulse for nativisation was very strong. Kannada Navodaya poetry was perhaps more complex than the English Romantic poetry. It was not merely a literary revolution, but a manifestation of the total Indian and Kannada Renaissance, and, therefore, had a wider social and cultural base. The struggle for freedom and the movement for the unification of Karnataka worked as strong dual forces. Awareness of the now forgotten rich heritage made the poets conscious of their tradition and they felt it necessary to relate themselves to it. The need for immediate social reforms in the stagnant society brought greater social awareness. Gandhi, Ramakrishna Paramahamsa, Vivekananda, Aurobindo, Tagore and several other political, spiritual and social thinkers moulded the sensibility of the period. This accounts for the rich variety of themes, moods, images, language and rhythm in poetry. Patriotism, enthusiasm and optimism generated by the spirit of the time found expression in the recurring imagery of sunrise and dreams.

Prose, by and large, is dominated by realism. Romanticism in fiction is confined to the historical novel which was nurtured by the romantic interest and pride in the past. Romance and glorified history, without much pretence at historical accuracy, went together in the novels of Galagnath. Glorification of history continued to hold sway in the novels of later writers like Ta. Ra. Su. Both enjoyed popularity in their own time. But the chief romantic weakness, sentimentality, had a greater appeal in the social novels of A. Na. Kri. and Krishnamurthy Puranik. It still persists in the popular fiction, especially of women writers.

The Romantic strain appeared in a different form in drama. Some of the traditional villains like Ashwathama, Duryodhana and Keechaka underwent a change and became tragic heroes. The change of heart in the character of Ravana in Kuvempu's epic Ramayanadarshanam should also be seen in the same light.

The personal essay was essentially a product of romantic subjectivism and had its hey-day during the Navodaya period, but, with the advent of modernism, it looks like a dying form.

Criticism, until the beginning of New Criticism, was heavily influenced by the Western Romantic theories about poetic creation and the function of literature, and was mainly appreciative. But the early critics also shared interest in Indian poetics and tried to combine it with that of the western.

Gi.G.

ROMANTICISM (Kashmiri). It has rightly been said that romanticism cannot exactly be defined or limited in terms of time. Its constituents are very many, all of which can hardly find their expression in one writer. These constituents include, among other things, subjectivity, charm for the remote past and the middle ages, sympathy with the suffering mankind, longing for the millenium and the exotic, love of nature, melancholy, dreams, subconscious, the supernatural, and revolt against traditional forms. Besides, a particular approach to life resulting from the impassioned personality of the writer is of great importance. Kashmiri literature right from the days of Lal Ded (14th c.) to present day shows these romantic characteristics in one form or the other. The poetry of Lal Ded is romantic in that it aims at the ideal and strives for communion with the Absolute. Sheikh Nur-ud-Din is not very much different from Lal Ded. His is an impassioned voice, moral in tone and romantic in essence. The lyrics of Haba Khatoon (16th c.) are the result of the vicissitudes of life and pangs of separation from love. Fate plays truant with her, and it is the reminiscence of the past that adds to romantic pathos in her poetry. Haba Khatoon is followed by a host of poets, both mystics and Masnavi writers.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The third and fourth decades of this century bring into prominence two important poets. Abdul Ahad Azad (1903-1948) and Ghulam Ahmad Mahjoor (1885-1952). Azad is a revolutionary and a rebel, but in poetry he does not show any dislike for the traditional forms.He is against caste, creed, narrow nationalism and domination of the poor by the rich. Mahjoor is, in some respects, different from Azad and has a certain restraint to display. Essentially a love poet, his love poems are as tender as the petals of a rose. His is the love of an idealist, vibrant with perennial freshness and a romantic vision of immortality.

The year 1947 brought with freedom a great upheaval and change, and a cluster of young poets appeared on the scene. For the first time a number of prose writers, writing short stories, novels, essays and plays, etc. entered the literary field. Dina Nath Nadim (1916-1988) introduced into Kashmiri poetry free verse, blank verse, sonnet and opera. He sang of peace, of revolt against tyranny and dreamed of a bright future for mankind. Most of the poems of the period are impassioned and subjective. Besides Nadim, the other poets who reflect romantic tendencies are Ghulam Nabi Firaq (b.1922), Amin Kamil (b.1924), Rahman Rahi (b.1925), Ghulam Nabi Khayal (b.1936) and a few others including Ghulam Rasul Santosh.

From among prose writers Akhtar Mohi-ud-din (b.1929), Ali Mohammad Lone (b.1926), Amin Kamil, Bansi Nirdosh (b.1930) and Saif Ghulam Mohammad, who write fiction, portray sympathetically the life of the lower middle classes and of those who live in slums. Imbalance in form and matter, dichotomy between intellect and feeling, and inadequate understanding of human nature sometimes affect part of the literature of this period and add to its overall romantic vagary.

About the middle of the century a sort of disillusionment started appearing, particularly in the writings of Rahman Rahi, Amin Kamil and Ghulam Nabi Firaq, which deepened with the passage of time. Though it reflected itself in varied ways—expressions of sentimentality, meaninglessness of life, animosity in man, inadequacy of moral order—some of these expressions have romantic overtones, while others are a distinct departure from romanticism.

G.N.F.

ROMANTICISM (Konkani). According to the documents of the Portuguese era, the history of Konkani literature is divided into two distinct periods: the first from the 16th century to the middle of the 19th century, and the second from the mid-nineteenth century onwards. It is in the literature of the second period that ingredients of romanticism are to be seen.

Romanticism in Konkani poetry is mainly found in such poets as R.V.Pandit, Manohar Sardessai, and Bakibab Borkar. Their poems reveal the spontaneous expression of feelings and love for the 'beautiful'. This advent of romanticism in Konkani poetry is a phase in itself in the overall growth of its literature.

Pandit has to his credit many collections of poems, the most significant being Ailem tasem gailem, Chandravall, Nach re mora and Dorya gazota. His poems are usually simple, but sometimes they strike a sublime note too. Voices of Peace is a collection of Pandit's poems in an English translation. Some of the poems in this collection show romantic elements and are reminiscent of English poets, like Wordsworth. For example, the poem 'The path to my childhood home' which glorifies childhood, recalls Wordsworth's Immortality Ode.

Pandit's Nach re mora, again, depicts love in all its aspects. The images are drawn from commonplace incidents in life and from the beautiful objects of Nature. For Pandit, nature is an unending source of inspiration. Sometimes the poet turns inward also in search of beauty.

Bakibab Borkar's small poem entitled 'Nile savle' is a typical example of the romantic trend in Konkani poetry. In the depiction of the blue bird and its sweet song, we hear an echo of Keats' poem 'Ode to a Nightingale'. While reading the poem, we share the same joy which the poet had felt while watching the blue bird. The poet's creative imagination and feelings have beautifully flowered in this poem.

Manohar Sardessai, the well-known modern poet, is unrivalled for his wealth of imagery, profundity of thought and vividness of expression in his works. His poems indicate his deep knowledge of life and its various aspects. His collection of poems entitled Pissollim is an outstanding contribution to Konkani poetry. His poems are direct and unadorned, many of which reveal the beauty and power of nature. Mhajo Dev is an autobiographical poem unfolding the poet's view of God. He is adverse to worshipping the idols of God placed in temples, for he sees Him everywhere in this universe. Poet Bayabhau has also contributed to romantic literature and his poem 'Athrakani' represents the spirit of romanticism in Konkani.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

N.P.M.

ROMANTICISM (Maithili). Maithili literature never witnessed Romanticism as a movement, though there has been always a traditionalist way of escaping into the world of myth and legend, not infrequently based on Sanskrit epics and puranas. The imagery and nature symbolism were equally suggested of the seemingly eternal and unattainable values. Modern literature tried to inherit this movement, but quite early it was superseded by Realism. The period between 1938-49 has been roughly regarded as one dominated by the romantic lyric. Stray romantic lyrics were written by Bhuvaneshwar Singh 'Buvan' (1907-44), Arsi Prasad Singh (b.1911), Jayanarayan Malik (b. 1913) and even Kashikanta Mishra 'Madhupa' (1906-87). Primarily, the important romantic poets are three: Saras-kavi Ishanatha Jha (1907-1965), the celebrated writer of emotional lyrics collected in Mala (1945); Upendra Thakur 'Mohan' (1913-1980), who won the Sahitya Akademi Award (1978) for his volume of poems, Baji uthal murli (Flute has begun playing, 1977) and Mayanand Mishra (b. 1934) as poet before 1962.

Of these poets, Ishanatha Jha was the best in subject-matter as well as style; indeed, spiritually he was a true romantic poet. He was rightly acclaimed as 'Saras-kavi' (poet of aesthetic feelings). The lyrics of 'Mohan' and the earlier ones of Mayananda were equally inspired and emotionally surcharged, but the sources of their romanticism were different. Eroticism and pathos, mingled with mellifluous diction, made them more sentimental than romantic.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Harimohan Mishra, Adhunika Maithili kavita (1980).

J.M.

ROMANTICISM (Malayalam). The earliest signs of romanticism appeared in Malayalam literature as part of a revolt against conventionalism in the second half of the nineteenth century. By the turn of the century the revolt gathered enough momentum to mark the beginnings of a new era, and in the course of the first two decades of the twentieth century threw up impressive models of a variety of literature with a firm foot in the cultural life of Kerala. All this took place at a time when society was undergoing a general transformation as a result of English education, which had brought it into contact with western literature.

The first notable poetical work in this regard is A.R. Rajaraja Varma's (1863-1918) Malaya vilasam (1905), which, though entrenched in the Indian tradition in most respects, exhibits the essential qualities of a lyrical composition. Two earlier works showing the romantic tendency are K.C. Kesava Pillai's (1868-1913) Asannamarana chintashatakam (1895) and C.S. Subrahmanian Patti's (1875-1954) Oru vilapam (1903). V.C. Balakrishna Panicker's (1889-1915) Oru vilapam (1909) is also worth mentioning in this connection. From all these poems it is clear that, in spite of the lyrical and romantic element, the desire to re-create the spirit of ancient Indian poetry represented by Kalidasa formed the fountainhead of the new movement in Malayalam poetry at least in its initial stages.

This is true to a large extent in the case of Vallattol Narayana Menon (1878-1958) also. It was he who set the trend and influenced most of the younger poets. He brought about a general change in the sensibility of the readers and shaped the romantic movement of the first three decades of the twentieth century. As he did not know English, his understanding of foreign literatures was confined to a second-hand knowledge of a few masterpieces. Being unacquainted with the imported models, he had to evolve his own brand of lyrical poetry by re-discovering the national tradition. He was an admirer of the Indian epics, the Vedas and the puranas, ancient folk-songs and above all the great cultural heritage left behind by a galaxy of sages and poets. It was this fact which compelled him to identify himself with the national struggle for freedom. Almost all the shorter poems included in the different volumes of Sahityamanjari and the longer works like Acchanum makalum (1936) represent an indigenous variety of romantic poems.

Kumaran Asan (1873-1924), the author of some of the greatest pieces of romantic poetry in Malayalam, was different from Vallattol in many respects. He became acquainted with English and Bengali poetry, and wrote an elegy named Prarodanam (1919) and translated Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia. His first major poem 'Vinapoovu' (1907) and the second 'Nalini' (1911) are even now regarded as landmarks in the history of Malayalam literature. Almost all his poems are characterized by intense lyrical self-expression surcharged with emotion. He was also an uncompromising advocate of individual freedom. All these bring them close to western romanticism. At the same time the transcendental philosophy, which pervades his poetical works, is essentially Indian. The new book of his poems, therefore, is the result of a fusion of Indian poetic ideals from within and western poetic moulds from without.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The works of most poets of the next generation were generally romantic in nature, their romanticism being an extension of Vallattol's aesthetics, forms and techniques from the West. Well-known poets like Sankara Kurup (1901-1978), Changampuzha Krishna Pillai (1913-1947), and Vailoppillil Sridhara Menon (1911-1985) come under this category. Depiction of an ardent desire for unrestricted personal liberty and for an ideal life conducive to the realization of the dreams of the individual, the mental agony arising from disillusionment, and patriotism, chivalry, emotional conflicts, etc. are predominant in the romantic poetry of this period. There are many outbursts combined with a general note of idealism. Techniques like the employment of sensuous romantic imagery were adopted from the west. At the same time, there was an effort to recreate and revitalize some of the elements of traditional poetry. The tendency to discard Sanskrit metres became almost universal, the indigenous ones and those used in folklores becoming more fashionable partly because of their musical appeal.

The element of romanticism is discernible in Malayalam fiction also. The novel and the short story were new genres adopted from the west and they came here as part of the romantic movement. Most of the early Malayalam novels were the adaptations of works in English not only in respect of plot, but also in respect of characterization and narration. Yet the very first significant novels in Malayalam proved the possibility and value of a different creative approach. O. Chandu Menon's (1842-1989), Indulekha (1889) and Sarada (Part I, 1892) are two memorable works of this kind, born out of the direct influence of English models. C.V. Raman Pillai (1858-1922), who was inspired by Ivanhoe to write a romance in Malayalam entitled Marthanda Varma (1891), created a new legend capable of symbolizing the aspirations of his readers and went on to produce two more historic novels, Dharma Raja (1913) and Ramaraja Bahadur (1920) based on the Indian concepts of life and art. Few of those who succeeded these two novelists had their creative power or vision; nevertheless, historical novelists like K.M. Panicker (1894-1963) succeeded, to a certain extent, in keeping alive the Indian concept of romanticism. Among the other types of novels there have been only very few successful ones like Apphante makal (1933) of Bhavathrathan Namboodiripad (1902-1944). But with the arrival on the scene of S.K. Pottekkatt (1913-1982), the romantic novel registered a refreshing, though short-lived, revival. Very soon the concept of romantic novel was overshadowed by that of realistic fiction. The history of romantic short stories is less encouraging because it failed to produce any inspiring model, not even a memorable one until the days of writers like Pottekkat. Here also the realistic story overtook the romantic one very quickly in the forties.

A large number of romantic plays have been written in Malayalam. They include a series of historical plays inspired by those of D.L.Roy, whose famous works have been translated, and quite a few mythological plays. Numerous melodramatic works have also been written, but only some like those of Kainikkara Padmanabha Pillai (1898-1976) and Kainikkara Kumara Pillai (1900-1988) produced a strong impact on Malayalam theatre.

A major portion of literary criticism in Malayalam is impressionistic and a good number of critics have strongly advocated the romantic point of view. In this sense one might say that there is a school of romantic criticism in Malayalam. But practically no critic has come forward to explain the aesthetics of romanticism and its theoretical basis. Moreover, romantic concepts are often mixed with those belonging to other schools also.

With the advent of realism and the later literary concepts, romanticism has ceased to grow as a movement in Malayalam. But during the forty to fifty years beginning with 1889, when it was a progressive force, the movement was able to maintain the continuity of the literary tradition, mainly because the major writers of those days adopted the new approach without prejudice to their basic sense of reality and made only selective use of the element in their writings. Later, when writers tried to make their works explicitly romantic by borrowing western models, romanticism became superficial. Depiction of imaginary themes, over-simplification, excessive idealization at the cost of the essential sense of reality, sentimentalism and the employment of illusory images and vocabulary are some of the characteristics of this superficial romanticism. But the elements of the romantic vision, especially those sublime ones associated with the inner experiences of human beings, appear in contemporary writings also in a meaningful manner.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G. Sankara Pillai, Malayala nataka sahitya charitram (Kerala Sahitya Akademi, 1980); K.M.Tharakan, Malayala novel sahitya charitram (Kerala Sahitya Akademi, 1980); M. Leelavathy, Malayala kavita sahitya charitram (Kerala Sahitya Akademi, 1980); N. Krishna Pillai, Kairaliyute katha (Kottayam, 1958); Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer, Kerala sahitya charitram, Vols IV & V (University of Kerala, 1955).

K.S.N.P.

ROMANTICISM (Marathi). There was no distinct or deliberate movement of Romanticism in Marathi literature, though some vital elements of the trend are apparent enough. Some critics claim that Dnyaneshwar was the first romantic poet in Marathi because of his emphasis on imagination, his sensation-based poetic images, and his attraction for the strange beauty of Nature. Perhaps, the expressions of mystic experiences of other saint-poets like Namdev. Muktabai, Janabai, Eknath and Tukaram could also be regarded as Romantic. These saint-poets reacted against the traditional structure of artificial Sanskrit poetry with the powerful expression of their subjective experiences in the esoteric domain of spirituality. Later, the Shahir poets of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries became advocates of unconventionalism through their poetry of soaring imagination and unrestrained emotions.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Echoes of English romantic poets were distinctly heard in Marathi poetry by the end of the nineteenth century, when Keshavsut started writing a new type of poetry. Other poets like Govindagraj, Balkavi, Rendalkar, etc, joined the trend with their own contributions. The cult was named 'Keshavsut sampradaya' by Marathi critics, though its salient Romantic characteristics were highlighted only at a later stage. The term 'Romanticism' was translated variously in Marathi for example as 'Soundaryavad' and 'Swachchhandavad', but 'Keshavsut sampradaya' was never fully equated with the term. Some poets outside the Sampradaya, like B.R.Tambe, Madhav Julian, Girish, and to some extent Yashwant, exhibit some features of Romanticism, whereas such members of the Sampradaya as Tilak and Vinayak had very little of those characteristics.

Before Keshavsut's emergence, Marathi poetry was busy copying the old patterns. Imitation of either Sanskrit or newly-acquainted English epics was the ultimate goal of the poet's craft. Even attempts at compositions of new patterns like the ode and the elegy stuck to the traditional form. Poems of the new trend were looked at with suspicion by the established tradition. Keshavsut was described as 'eccentric', 'morbid' and 'womanish', and his style was criticised as non-poetic and English-dominated. However, Keshavsut, who drew inspiration from the English Romantic poets, particularly Keats and Shelley, never imitated them blindly.

Romanticism in Marathi poetry displays patterns of poetic expression of intense sensibility and delicate susceptibility. It developed new elegance of style, though it did not ignore its native heritage. It aimed at a fusion of new perceptions with the heritage of our own philosophy.

Keshavsut personified 'imagination' as a goddess in his poem 'Kalpalata'. He delineates her as seated at a remote, lonely spot, engaged in weaving a piece of cloth. In its texture are shades of clouds, dance of waves, flashes of lightning, twittering of birds, sounds of waterfalls, and shooting of stars.

In his poetry of nature we find echoes of his yearnings. We see his nostalgia for the idyllic Konkan landscape in 'Ek khede' (A village), his perception of nature in terms of a philosophical apprehension of human predicament in 'Pushpaprat' (To the flower) and 'Bhring' (The bee), his relationship with nature as a wild companion in 'Vatachakra' (The whirlwind), and his confrontation with her in 'Tutari' (The trumpet). In his nature poetry, Balkavi too reveals the glory of colours as well as his dramatised feelings in highly evocative symbols and images. Govindagraj also shows the same romantic perception in his poems 'Pakharas' (To the bird), 'Murli' (The flute), 'Haltya pimpalpanas' (To the fluttering pipal leaf), 'Aveli oradnarya kokiles' (To the cuckoo, chanting at odd time),etc.

The romantic melancholy impels a poet to portray the subtle aspects of a woman's charm rather than describe her beautiful body only. Tambe excels in this kind of art. Even Keshavsut, describing feminine beauty, uses evocative images: 'When lighting strikes a tree, its blasted state resembles mine'. This image is later picked up by Govindagraj who developed it into a full metaphoric expression of agony in love.

These Romantic poets, by and large, also express an intense urge for change. Keshavsut's 'Tutari' (The trumpet), Tilak's 'Ranashing' (The war-bugle) and Bee's 'Danka' (The kettle drum), all symbolise this urge. Even Govindagraj and Balkavi wrote poems like 'Dusserah' and 'Dharmaveer' respectively in this vein. Keshavsut's call to raise aloft the banner of rebellion, pulling injustice to shreds, represented the revolutionary attitude. Tambe gave vent to this urge symbolically in his poem 'Rudras avahan' (A call to the god of destruction).

The element of subjectivity found a new expression in poetry. Keshavsut projected himself as a 'man of the new age'.

> I am the new soldier
> With the new spirit
> Of the new age.

Such egoism identifies itself with a super-ego, manifest in the universe. This identification is not just a stretch of the poet's imagination, it is also an extension of the Indian Advaita philosophy which holds that an individual can attain union with the Universal Spirit at an elevated level of experience. The Romantic poets experienced it as a result of the intensification of their artistic urge.

Pessimism is the result of a romantic writer's confrontation with the harsh realities of life. The sight of a tender flower can fill a poet with sadness:

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In this world of darkness
Upon the pyres of dead hopes
My ghost is wandering
Without rest, without peace. (Keshavsut)

Govindagraj and Balkavi too express a similar feeling of gloom in their poems.

In fiction, Hari Narayan Apte's historical novels, modelled on Scott's historical romances, show some elements of romanticism. Apte blended historical events with the spirit of fancy. In fact, he leaned on historical events to give a certain romantic projection to his imagination. The dreamy aspiration of youth in Ushakal (The dawn), the heroic chivalry of Tanaji in Gad ala pan sinha gela (The fort is conquered, but the lion is lost), and the dramatic hyperbole of love and revenge in Vajraghat (The thunderbolt) are indications of his romantic attitude. Novelists like Nathmadhav and V.V.Hadap followed him in this trend. Even Ranajit Desai's Swami in the sixties projects the protagonist in the romantic style. In the non-historical novels, N.S.Phadke's creation of a celluloid world of romance, V.S.Khandekar's visionary attitude towards life, and R.V.Dighe's glorification of tribal and rural life are reverberations of romanticism in Marathi.

Marathi drama, in the early stages, remained mainly romantic in attitude, with some important exceptions like Deval's Sharada. Kirloskar, Deval and others exploited mythological themes to depict romantic experiences. Govindagraj, who was extremely popular as a playwright, reveals the salient features of the French romantic tragedy in his plays, such as unregulated passion, absence of proportion, unbounded play of imagination, and eccentricity of diction. His play Prem-sanyas (Renunciation of love) had the same impact on the Maharashtrian youth as Goethe's novel Sorrows of Young Werther had in Germany, owing to its romantic idealism and emotional excess. Right from the days of Kirloskar, 'Sangeet Natak' (musical drama) has remained the most popular and adored form of Marathi theatre. The semi-classical music used in the songs of play heightens the romantic feeling. The trend is visible even in Khadilkar's plays, especially in Manapman (Pride and insult).

The wave of romanticism has now receded, though it is not totally absent in modern Marathi literature. We do find romantic overtones in poetry (Kusumagraj, B.R.Borkar, N.D.Mahanor, etc). as well as drama (Bal Kolhatkar, Vasant Kanetkar, Madhusudan Kalelkar, etc).

Nis. M.

ROMANTICISM (Oriya). Medieval Oriya poetry grew out of the tradition of ancient Indian literature that laid emphasis on imagination and was more idealistic than realistic. It could be said that it was romantic. The social condition of the period fostered its growth.

Till the middle of the sixteenth century Orissa flourished as an independent state under independent rulers. But from 1568, under the Pathan and the Mughal rulers, a period of terror and tyranny began with concomitant social chaos, disorder and insecurity. As a result a new attitude grew among the populace. They were inclined to take refuge in the world of imagination. There was a preoccupation with love and romance which pushed social awareness to the background. The literature of the subsequent two centuries grew out of this attitude. This literature was patronised by small feudatory chiefs. Some of them were scholars and were lovers of arts. But the literature they patronised inevitably breathed of feudal sentiments and upheld its values. It was ornate, rhetorical and sensuous. The most noteworthy poets who wrote this poetry were Sisu Sankar Das, Dhananjoy Bhanja, Narashingh Sena, Upendra Bhanja, Bishnu Das and Brajanath Badajena.

The best specimen of this type of literature may be found in the works of Upendra Bhanja who says about his own poetry. 'I regard my lilting songs as a personified woman, and, therefore, I decorate her with all types of ornaments. This woman with her music would charm the minds of others. The lover would win her lady-love and the connoisseur of poetry would discover the meaning of my poems'. That these poetic works were mainly written for the elite and educated has also been admitted by Upendra Bhanja: 'My poems are like sweet stems of sugarcane. Whoever has the sharp teeth of knowledge can pierce into it and partake of the sweet juice.'

The romantic attitude is also expressed in the lyrical compositions of the period. A good many songs dealing with the love-sports of Radha and Krishna tend to be an expression of the poets' romantic feelings which have little to do with Vaishnavism. In these songs are depicted the first acquaintance of Radha and Krishna, their intense longing for each other, the pangs of separation, the dreamy atmosphere of the forest on the bank of the river Yamuna, and the love-sports of the beautiful gopis and Krishna.

The modern age of Oriya literature began with the spread of western education. The makers of the new age were greatly influenced by the works of the English Romantic poets, particularly by those of Wordsworth, Shelley, Keats, and Scott. The poems of Radhanath Ray and his successors, Nandakishore Bal, Padmacharan Pattanaik, Kuntala Kumari Sabat and Godavarish Mishra, testify to this. But it must be noted that the imitation of the western mode ran parallel with the rediscovery of social and political reality. Most of the poets of the period oscillated between these two tendencies. Some of them, however, boldly described the beauty of women and sincerely expressed the ecstasy of love ignoring the real problems of society.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation

But after the First World War the romantic temperament which had been manifest in the poetry of Radhanath and his successors assumed a different character. Poetry became more concerned with the individual and his experience. This is seen not only in the poems of the members of the 'Sabuja Sahitya Samiti', like Annadasankar Roy, Baikunthanath Pattanaik, Kalindicharan Panigrahi and others, but also in the works of their contemporaries and successors like Mayadhar Manasingha, Radhamohan Gardnaik, Kunjabehari Das, Krishnachandra Tripathy and Binod Nayak. But this preoccupation with individual experience of love, with imagination and nature, gradually gave way to new realism which came to gain ground due to the spread of Marxism and the people's movement in the feudatory states of Orissa, non-cooperation movement and the after-effects of the World War.

Most of the novels, short stories and dramas written during the period are also influenced by this new attitude. Umeshchandra Sarkar's Padmamali (1888), regarded as the first novel in Oriya, is a romantic tale of the clash between two small states of Orissa which got involved in a riot following the kidnapping of a girl named Padmamali. But the work also depicts the social conditions of the states of Orissa in the early phase of the British rule and the prevailing anarchy. The second Oriya novel, Bibasini (1892) of Ramasankar Ray similarly depicts the romantic love of a widow, but it also portrays the maladministration, oppression and starvation which scourged Orissa under the Marathas.

Fakirmohan Senapati who marked the dawn of a new epoch dealt with realistic themes in his fictional works like Chhaman Athaguntha (1902), Mamu (1913) and Prayaschitta (1915). But his successors revived the romantic themes. The novels of Nandakishore Bal, Baisnavcharan Das, Upendra Kishore Das, Kanhucharan Mohanty, Rajkishore Pattanaik, Nityananda Mohapatra, Bibhuti Bhusan Pattanaik and Pratibha Ray were essentially romantic.

The Oriya short story, which had its beginning with the works of Fakirmohan Senapati, initially dealt with realistic themes. But subsequent writers came to deal with both romantic and realistic themes. In fact, the stories written by writers like Ramachandra Acharya, Rajkishore Roy, Harishchandra Baral and Pranakrishna Samal are more romantic than realistic.

Most of the dramas written during the period by Ramsankar Ray, Godavarish Misra, Aswinikumar Ghose, Ramaranjan Mohanty, Ramachandra, Adwaitacharan Mohanty and Kalicharan Pattanaik exhibit the same trend. These playwrights borrowed matter from mythology and history. Even the social plays were not free from a romantic tinge. Kalicharan's once famous social play named Girls School dealt with sentimental adolescent love. Several verse plays and one-act plays written by Pranabandhu also have a romantic undertone.

Till 1936 when Orissa became a separate province, modern Oriya literature remained to a large extent romantic with the major exception of Fakirmohan Senapati. It was only with the spread of the nationalist movement, the Marxist ideas and the new awareness of social inequalities that Oriya literature began to show a serious concern for realism.

J.B.M.

ROMANTICISM (Punjabi). In Punjabi literature the grotesqueness and exaggeration of events, and refusal to recognise the limitations of the reality began to be evoked in the days of Sikh rule, for the Sikh peasantry had achieved during the last quarter of the eighteenth and the first half of the nineteenth century a power and a glory which were undreamed of by any Indian people for about a thousand years. Ahmed Yar, Mohammed Baksh and others, who took their subjects from the wonderland of the Muslims of Arabia, wrote stories of the world of Hatim Tai, Bahram Gor and Shaharzad of The Arabian Nights, but they lacked the talent, and perhaps also the milieu which Taine has called on essential condition for litrerary achievement. Romanticism came into Punjabi literature as a pale reflexion of English romanticism of the first half of the nineteenth century. Bhai Vir Singh tried to imitate Wordsworth in his perception of nature, but could not catch its elusive spirit and slid into the evocation of a metaphysical spiritual creator hidden behind. Mohan Singh was romantic in the way of John Keats, but lacked that wealth of mythology which mingles men and gods together. In fact, romanticism in Punjabi literature has not achieved any remarkable success. Even poets like Amrita Pritam, Prabhjot and Shiv Kumar could not succeed in this trend, for the social consciousness of the twentieth century clipped their wings and kept them on a negotiable height of historical and mundane reality.

S.S.S.

ROMANTICISM (Rajasthani). The early Rajasthani poetry was pre-eminently concerned with descriptions of war and valour of Rajput heroes. There were, however, exceptions too, e.g. Veli Krishna Rukmani ri, Dhola maru ra duha and Jethwai ra duha are love poems. The romantic element was confined to chivalry and idealised love, but what we understand by the term Romanticism today had its stirrings in the poetry of our times only. Under an impulse of romantic feeling, Chandrasinha composed Vadali (Tiny cloud, 1941), though he is at his best in Loo (Hot winds, 1954). Nature in relation to personal feeling has been delineated graphically in these poems. Nanurama Sanskarta's Kalyan (1949), Narayana Sinha Bhati's Sanjh (1954) and Sumerashinha Shekhawata's Meghamal (1964), are other poems worth mentioning. Depiction of evening in Sanjh is very minute. It is the only book on nature poetry and contains a description of evening in the desert-land which speaks of spiritual mysticism in a number of stanzas. The poet is apparently impressed by the 'chhayavada' trend, then prevalent in Hindi poetry. Blank verse was introduced for the first time in Kalyan. Kanhaiyalala Sethiya's Mimjhar (1972) and Lilatans (1974), Manohar Sharma's Gajamoti and Kunjan, Meghraj Mukul's Danphara and Chhiyan tawado are imbued with the spirit of romanticism in respect of feeling, ideology and speculation.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Though the impact of romanticism is mainly on poetry, there are traces of it in Rajasthani novel, short story and drama also. As in other languages, Rajasthani poetry also rid itself of the outmoded romances and technical feats of metre and rhyme, and entered a new era of poetry which depicts modern life with all its anxieties and frustrations, and keeps to the portrayal of life in the raw and crude form. Today's Rajasthani poetry has dispensed with the cumbersome metre and rhyming system and freed itself from the scholastic exercises. It has adopted a new structure and imagery of 'new poetry'. So is the case with Rajasthani prose. It is based on reality and probes into human psyche through the pulsations of perception.

S.N.J.

ROMANTICISM (Sanskrit). The word 'romantic' has various associations marking it off from the 'classicial' in Western criticism. Its matter is concerned more with the inexhaustible realm of man's psychic life, the play of emotion and feeling; and its manner is one of dazzling or bewildering complexity. Uniqueness of individual experience is highlighted by proliferation of detail. Its spirit is one of the rebellion against conventional restrictions and assertion of individuality. In Sánskrit we do not have these nice distinctions. Broadly we might say that unlike the typical mode of the kavya in general which observes rules regarding themes and characters and diction, a lighter vein of writing also appears in Sanskrit, particularly in a number of poets portraying the subtle shades of emotions like love, disenchantment with life, devotional fervour and beauties of nature agog with life, which may be taken to represent the typically romantic in Sanskrit literature. Love poetry and nature poetry are its chief branches, one running into the other. They also possess a lyrical quality in abundant measure. Yet, one would be committing a mistake in taking them to be the expression of the writer's personal emotion, because the Indian theory of 'rasa' approves for literature only the emotions which are cleared of their private associations and raised to the level of common sharability (Sadharanikarana).

The earliest expression of the romantic temperament in Sanksrit literature is particularly found in many of the verses in the Rigveda where a feeling of wonder born of an observation of the objects of Nature is communicated. In them one does not find poetic frenzy, but sincerity of feeling and sense of wonder and awe, which are quite impressive. The same expression may occasionally be seen in some passages of description in the Mahabharata and Kumarsambhava and also in Meghduta. Kalidasa was followed by Bharavi (Kiratarjuniya) Magha, (Shishupalavadha) and many others who expressed the romantic in their choice of subjects and treatment. In Sanskrit drama, in Kalidasa's Malavikagnimitra, Abhijnanashakuntala and Vikramorvashi and the plays of Shriharsha, Bhavabhuti, Bhatta Narayana and many others the romantic traits are seen operative in powerful and different degrees. The Sanskrit romances and tales, though in prose, such as the Dashakumaracharita of Dandin and Bana's Kadambari with Gunadhya's Brihatkatha, Somadeva's Kathasaritsagara, and Ksemendra's Brihatkathamanjari provide the reader a feeling of the unreal and indicate the presence of a kind of romanticism in different ways.

The range of the short poems (khandakavyas) in the lighter vein is limited; but they are perfect in embodying a particular inner state of mind almost spontaneously. Even in the typical form a single quatrain in Sanskrit often mirrors a mood in all its complexity. And we have a number of anthologies of such single verses (muktakas). Often they take also the form of didactic epigrams. However, in all these forms, there remains a modicum of conventionality, though of a kind different from that of the mahakavya, in respect of general tone. But in regard to concrete particulars there are some conventions (Kavisamayas) common to all Sanskrit poetry. These are derived sometimes from erotic mythology associated with Kamadeva (God of love).

The erotic world is peopled by messengers or go-betweens whose sole endeavour is to bring about the union of frustrated lovers. This is in deference to the dictates of Vatsyayana, the author of Kamasutra or the science of love.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

Similarly, the emotional atmosphere of this branch of literature is built up by a stock imagery. The love-lorn Chakravaka birds get separated at sunset and keep on crying for each other throughout the night until they mate again in the morning; the moonstones ooze with feeling at moonrise. The lotus is the loving spouse of the sun as the dark lily is of the moon.

In point of diction, too, the lighter vein provides ample scope for the use of a vast variety of syllabic metres, the names of which, too, symbolise beautiful women in love (e.g. Vasantatilaka, Mandakranta). Further, the influence of folk love-poetry also is evident in Sanskritized Prakrit quatrains in the Arya metrical patterns.

The common designation of these love-lyrics in Sanskrit is Shringara kavya. Here again, Kalidasa is the foremost exemplar, since his success has virtually caused the disappearance of earlier poems. His Ritusamhara (The cycle of seasons) breathes the spirit of love-in-union (sambhoga-shringara). We have neither story nor autobiography here, but the distilled essence of the pure love of a newly married couple. This new romantic tradition welcomes a fashionable society with the music hall, the courtesan's saloon, the theatre and the bar. But Kalidasa shows moderation in his aestheticism and avoids cloying sensuality. To him poetry itself has become a religion as it were. He is refreshingly free from the banalities of convention as well as heady indulgence, from gauche sentimentality as well as worn-out cliches.

We see Kalidasa's art in its rich mellowness in the next poem Meghaduta (The cloud-messenger) which has won universal acclaim. It is a poem dedicated to love-in-separation (vipralambha-shringara). As coloured in the poet's imagination, the inanimate clouds and other objects of Nature become instinct with life, and the clouds assume the role of the ideal messengers between the separated lovers. How much the poet's imagination is attached to every city and temple, every bird and animal, every hill and river, as a backdrop to his eye for beauty in women of different regions and types, is brought out in verse after verse. Kalidasa's imagination provides vivid pictures of the enchanting beauty of a fairyland. Thus comes the unique blend of passion and restraint, aestheticism and philosophic calm.

An equally successful anthology of quatrains on love as well as worldly wisdom and the mood of renunciation is the Shatakas of Bhartrihari (c.7th c.) on Shringara, Niti and Vairagya. These have gained an almost unparallel popularity with their intensely human quatrains and their telling effect derived from a spontaneous and simple diction and a moving content.

Amaru's Shataka scores even better and the new critics of Sanskrit are never tired of turning to it for illustrating the delicate art of portraying the emotion of love in a hundred telling ways. Amaru also seems to be of the same date as Bhartrihari; but his vignettes in verse show a greater delicacy of touch and a keener insight into sophisticated love, and the artistic skill is evinced in the witty turns and figurative language.

About the twelfth century fresh waves of Shiva-bhakti and Vishnu-bhakti arose in the country and in the succeeding centuries they found a very natural and spontaneous expression in the works of religious teachers like Jagaddhara in Kashmir and Lilashuka in Kerala. In this genre the genuineness and fervour of the devotee's feelings of love for God and the pitiful outpourings of his heart are another expression of romanticism. The Chaitanya movement gave rise to innumerable religious poets of whom the two Gosvamins, Rupa and Jiva, (16th century) are noteworthy.

An important work, strangely romantic in temparament, is Jayadeva's Gitagovinda (c.1200) which combines in one the different arts of popular entertainment like music, dance and histrionics, with a rich structure of poetry whose diction is as musical and rhythmic as its content is rich with strains of Shringara relating to Radha and Krishna.

K. Kr.

ROMANTICISM (Sindhi). The literature produced during the Muslim rule up to 1843, when Sindh was conquered by the British, is sufistic excepting the poetry of Hamal Laghari (1815-79), Fateh Fakir and Gul Muhammed 'Gul' (1811-56). The entire bulk of this poetry is written in Persian script as the present Sindhi script was formulated only in 1853.

Hamal Laghari, considered by some critics the best-known poet in Sindhi after Shah Abdul Latif, composed romantic poems in folk-forms. His narrative of Hira Ranjha is in the form of a dialogue between Hira and her mother. Fateh Fakir, on the other hand, composed kafis in which he imagined himself to be Sasui in quest of Punhun. Extravagant in emotion, their poetry lacks serenity and harmony. On the other hand, one comes across the indisriminate use of images and allusions in the ghazals of Gul Mahammad 'Gul'. Even the great admirers of 'Gul' are of the view that all the 175 ghazals in his Diwan-e-Gul (1858) lack spontaneity and mellifluousness. For his industry and technical excellence, 'Gul' is said to have achieved some kind of success.

Divan-e-Sangi (1903-1904,2 vols) of Mir Abdul Hussain Khan 'Sangi' (1851-1924) embodies the outpourings of his heart that aches for a European lady in Bengal. He celebrates his nuptials with her in verse. He is an outstanding poet of physical love and excels in descriptions of nature in its raw form. His individual experiences seek their own form of expression imbued with an appeal unique in Sindhi ghazal.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Lilaramsingh 'Khaki' and Mirza Qalich Beg (1843-1907) were yet other two poets who revelled in romantic compositions. Their poems, however, lacked poetic inspiration and were inclined to be moral, instructional and dogmatic.

Lekhraj 'Aziz' (1905-1972) was the first successful romantic poet who brought to Sindhi readers a strong sense of physical love in his poems which reflect a love-sick, morose heart, pining and remorseful on the one hand, and the lavishness of 'Saqi' and 'Surhai' on the other. Aziz's romantic poetry, however, is in highly Persianised Sindhi and goes beyond the comprehension of a common reader. This is evident from the collection of his poems Kuliyat (1938) and Surhai (The decanter, 1963).

During the forties, the other romantic poets who appeared in Sindhi literary magazines were Narayan 'Shyam' (1922-1988), Hari 'Dilgir' (b.1916) and Parasram 'Zia'. Much later, in fifties, Harumal Sadarangami 'Khadim' (b.1913), Prabhu Chhugani 'Wafa' (b. 1915), Sugun Ahuja, Krishin 'Rahi' (b. 1932), Arjun 'Hasid' (b. 1930), Goverdhan Mehbubani (b. 1929), M. Kamal (b. 1925), Hari Kant (b. 1935) and several others entered the field of Sindhi romantic poetry. Most of these are semi-apologetic in tone and indulge at times in metrical exercises. Their poetry is replete with extravagance of images.

Hari Dilgir's Koda (The shells, 1941), Mauj kai mehrana (Revelling of the sea, 1966) and Pala pala jo parlau (Sounding of the moments, 1977) are collections of poems dealing with physical love as well as love of nature. The last collection won the poet the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1979.

Prabhu 'Wafa' treads on the beaten tracks in his poems compiled in Jhankar (The lilt, 1958) and Parwaz (The flight, 1962). His poems, enclosed in a new form, 'Panjkara' (five-line verse), in his latest compilation Surkh gulab surha khaba (Red roses, fragrant dreams, 1980) have two separate streaks of the romantic and the absurd in them. The book was picked up for Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1981.

Sadarangani 'Khadim' again speaks of 'Saqi' and 'Surhai' and of infatuation in his love poems compiled in Rangin rubaiyun (The colourful rubais, 1959), Ruha d'ino relo (Outpourings of the soul, 1963), Praha ji bakha (The ray of the dawn, 1972), Chikha (The scream, 1977), which received the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1978, and Khushbu jo safar (Stroll of the fragrance, 1980). Parasram 'Zia' is effective to a certain extent when he loads his poems heavily with intensity of love; and curously enough, many of his poems depict absurdity of life, too.

Sugun Ahuja's poems are compiled in Be ag jalan tha parwana (The moths burn without a flame, 1966). He is yet another excellent ghazal writer in Sindhi. His love poetry is frank and uninhibited, with austere imagery. He is very natural in his similes and metaphors which he draws from familiar surroundings.

Krishin Rahi's collection of poems Kumach (Bow of the fiddle, 1969), awarded by Sahitya Akademi in 1971, reflects abrasive animal love-sickness. M.Kamal's poems compiled in Jhurial jiu (The dilapidated being, 1975) depicts the traditional physical romance. He has, however, tried to be modern in his free verse in G'arandar baraf ja naqsha (The imprints of melting snow, 1975). Kamal has also experimented in the realm of new ghazal in Roshan rahun, dhundhla mag'a (Bright tracks, blurred goals, 1981) and succeeded in his efforts to a certain extent. In his ghazals he had at least used new metaphors which the trend demands.

Hari Kant, in his poems in Praha khan pakrin (Before the dawn breaks, 1961) gives vent to his intense emotions, cries away the pangs of separation and depicts long waits for his beloved. His romantic poetry is an exalted wail, mostly amatory, and emotion strring, written in simple and effective language.

Narayan 'Shyam', leaving apart his few poems published in magazines in the forties in which he depicted physical love, is a poet true to the philosophy of romanticism. He excels in the description of nature in its crude form. He develops a new relationship between man and universe. In his poems, especially those compiled in Maka bhina rabela (Jasmines moist with dew, 1964), he keeps on opening windows to show changing seasons. Here also he avoids the day-light so that his imagination may play with the fading lights of the twilight. It seems that the liking for the extraordinary is the essential ingredient of his romantic poetry. Many of his poems in subsequent collections Waria bhariyo palandu (Skirtful of sand, 1968) and Achinde laj'a maran (Shy of offering, 1972) overflow with romanticism.

The new trend of realism in the sixties overshadowed the romantic poetry. The new poets denounced romantic poetry and called it something that makes the soul of the poet putrid. Once again the Sindhi poets turned to analysis through logic to solve the riddles of life. But then the subtle, abstract elements in new poetry do, perhaps, become ingredients of a new romanticism.

The fiction based on romanticism entered Sindhi literature through translations. The masterpieces in English and Persian literature and those in Indian languages were translated into Sindhi by Mirza Qalic Beg, Nanikram Dharamadas, Jethmal Parsram and others. The publishing houses started by Pokardas & Sons and Master Harisingh in 1885 and 1888 respectively, brought out thrillers and whodunits by Hassaram Pessumal, Dharamdas Mirchandani and Nanikram Jaisinghani. The suspense fiction demands of the writer intense pellucid imagination. The characters nearly grip the reader. They are lone-eagle heroes of reactionary fantasy, the fascist mercenaries cracking the skulls of the innocent. The apocalytic fiction poses certain problems. The demands of imagining and then recording monumental events can push novelists into generalisations, the bigger the picture, the abstract and bloodless the language is likely to become. This is what happened with these novelists of suspense.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

We have the evidence of the first original romantic novel in Zeenat (1890) by Mirza Qalich Beg. Another original romnatic novel one comes across during the period was that of Lalchand Amardinomal, entitled Choth jo chand (The fourth day moon) which was serialised in Sarasvati magazine during 1905-1906.

The short stories of the writers in the romantic trend like Asanand Mamtora (b.1903) Jhamatmal Bhavnani (b.1903) and others, were regularly published in myriad magazines during the twenties of the present century. Mamtora's short story 'Felsuf' (The philosopher, 1920) and Bhavnani's stories 'Shirin' (1920) and 'Pautar prem' (The sacred love, 1925) demand a special mention.

In the November-December (1947) issue of Mehran magazine, one finds a short story Mulaqat (The rendezvous) by Saindad Solangi, which is purely based on physical love, but its treatment is excellent. Yet another story depicting animal instincts of man that attracts one's attention is that of Lekhu Tulsiani, compiled in Sindhi kahaniyun (Sindhi short stories, 1947).

The thirties saw yet another romantic novel Jahanara (1931) by Abdul Razak on the Sindhi literary scene. The thirties continued the romantic trend in fiction in spite of the interference of the progressive trend, and many short stories on romance were published in various magazines. The late thirties and early forties also brought Bankimchandra, Saratchandra and Rabindranath Tagore to Sindhi fiction through translations.

The first ever novel truly and entirely based on the philosophy of romanticism published in Sindhi was Shair (The poet, 1941) by Asanand Mamtora. Mamtora, in this novel, carries his characters to the highest level of romance. It is a direct link-up of the characters with the raw nature surrounding them. The subjective characters take the reader on their wings and involve him in intense feeling and the eternity. It is another thing that the characters in the end grow taller than the author and he loses his control over them. Mamtora was, however, successfully followed much later by Param Abichandani (1926), who in his novels Jharna (1962) and Hika j'ar, b'a j'idhiyun (A fire and two flames, 1964), brings back the characters to the naked nature to live within its bosom. Like Mamtora, Abichandani depicts the love of the higher level (soul love) and propounds the twin-soul theory.

The other worth-mentioning novels during the forties which depict physical love and sex are Prem b'andhan (Bonds of love, 1942) by Pitamber Kishnani, Zindaha dil (The throbbing heart, 1942) by Chandulal Jaisinghani, and Bina (1943)by Nirmal Jivatani.

The progressive trend dominated the Sindhi literary scene during the period between 1947-58. It was in 1958 that three writers, Mohan Kalpana (1930), Guno Samtani (1934) and Lal Pushp (1935), followed by others, rebelled against the progressives and parted their way with them with the establishment of Kunj (1960), a new magazine dealing with literature. The writings of Lal 'Pushp' are neo-realistic in character, but Kalpana and Samtani are essentially romantic writers. Krishin Khatwani (1927), who entered the literary field in forties, disentangled himself from the progressive fold and joined the ranks of the romantics.

Mohan Kalpana is a romantic and individualistic writer. In his short stories, he interlaces his individual excperience with the form and gives them a point and appeal almost unique in Sindhi short story. There is often something off-putting about the fiction of Kalpana, even when, as in his novel Runj'a ain pachha (The wilderness and the shadows, 1966) and the short stories compiled in Chandini ain zahiru (The moon-light and the poison, 1964) and Farshtan ji duniyan (The world of the angels, 1966), it is at its most controlled and least melodramatic. It is not the author's unvarying overburden of emotions that lies on all his characters, and on all his situations. The sense of monstrousness that arises from his fiction seems to have its source in an unbridgeable chasm between the highly rational and ordered intelligence of the writer and the chaos and hysteria of nearly everything he writes about. His latest collection of short stories Uha Shaama (That evening, 1933) was picked up for Sahitya Akademic Award for the year 1984.

Guno Samtani, the author of the collection of short stories Aprajita (1970), is supposed to have salvaged his heritage distorted by the progressives and the 'new' writers. The characters in his above mentioned collection and those depicted in yet another collection of his short stories Abhiman (The pride, 1965) are amusing words on paper—they belong to the ethereal world. Samtani's much-heightened realism works because it is faithful to specific locales, customs, attitudes and speech patterns. But his charaters become prisoners of their personalities. Nevertheless, Samtani has his representative stories in 'Pralaya' (The deluge), 'Abhiman' (The pride) and 'Khandahar' (The deluge), 'Abhiman' (The pride) and 'Khandahar' (The ruins) which will stand the test of time.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

None of the characters develops and engages any deep sympathy as portrayed in Krishin Khatwani's earlier short stories compiled in Vindri (1964), Mithri to na sunj'ato (You didn't understand me, my beloved, 1973) and Vairath zindagiyun (The wasted lives, 1974). The dilemma that the stories pose remains essentially superficial. His quick-cut writing, however, sustains interest. But he has given us elegant pieces in his subsequent short stories compiled in Akeli (The lone one, 1980) and Pardesin (The alien, 1980) Yad hika pyara ji (Reminiscences of a love, 1978) appears to be boldly contemporary. It treats with candour and sensibility some of the most disturbing problems of human relations.

A new type of romanticism is taking root in fiction. It is a variation in the theme of 'boy meets girl'. This, however, is not a hippy dope-smoking, counter-culture boy meeting his liberated chic. Rather, the boy and the girl here are archetypal lovers in the new type of fiction leading to neo-romanticism. This yet may be another form of escape in a realism-weary world. The neo-romantic fiction is bereft of eroticism and sexual play, though a gentle hand might reach out occasionally to a discreetely clothed bosom. We have yet to see and assess how this new trend succeeds in Sindhi literature.

P.A.

ROMANTICISM (Tamil) has not developed in Tamil as a movement. The romantic element is discernible only in occasional writings of certain poets and story-writers. It is Bharati, the famous freedom poet, who broke a new path in romantic writing as early as the second decade of the twentieth century. He had novel ideas, new forms and a bright and bold vision. His poems, which came straight from his heart, had all the element of a romantic work.

Here is one small piece entitled 'Akni kunchu' (Fire offspring) :

A fire offspring I saw
I berthed it in a jungle hole;
It burnt the woods and cooled...
In furied fires is there
Puerility or senility?
Bangs, bumps, and angered leaps
Fire orchestered in heaps!

'Kuyil pattu' (The song of cuckoo) is another masterpiece. A cuckoo attracts the poet to a mango grove. Next day when he went to the grove, he saw it making love to a monkey, and the third day it was drawn towards a bull. The poet was angry, but was calmed by the cuckoo the fourth day when it narrated the story of its previous birth. When, after having heard its story, the poet touched the bird, it transformed itself into a beautiful damsel. Later, the poet learned that everything was a dream.

Bharati opened a new vista for romanticism by introducing free verse. Here is an example:

Sun burns, shatters, makes plants hunger,
Burns seas, jets rains.
Lights galaxies.
Lives on darkness.
Sun!
What has happened to dawn?
Drove it off? Devoured it? Deadened it?

In free verse, Bharati was followed by N. Pichamurthy, Ku.Pa. Rajagopalan and C.S. Chellappa.

Bharatidasan followed the romantic trend both in form and content. 'Chanchivi parvatattin charal', a long poem in the first collection of Bharatidasan kavitaikal and Kurinchit tittu, an epic, are typical examples of romanticism of this period. His Pantiyan parichu, another work in epic form, narrates the love story of Annam and Velan. Many other long narrative poems of the poet such as 'Katal mer kumilikal' (Bubbles on the sea), 'Kurpuk kappiyam' (The epic of chastity) and 'Puratchik kavi' (The revolutionary poet) have rebels and revolutionaries as characters which is also one of the characteristic of a romantic poem. Again, the poet's 'Vittuk koliyum kattuk koliyum' (The house hen and the forest hen) and 'Urimaik kontattama'(Is it the celebration of liberty?) are symbolic in content. If Bharati is the first person to write modern romantic poem, it is Bharatidasan who enriched it both in quantity and quality.

The next romantic poet is Kaviyarasu Kannadasan. In many of his poems, there are easily recognisable images and symbols. We can also find the poet revealing himself in his poems. Subjective element dominated his poems—the incidents of his life, the emotions he felt, the sufferings he underwent and the pleasures he enjoyed—all found their expression in his verses.

Poets like Kambadasan, S.D.S. Yogi, Tamiloli and Suradha too belong to the category of Romantic poets. Of the poets who enriched new poetry (putuk kavitai) or free verse, mention has to be made of Abdul Rahman, Tamilanpan, Mira, Kamarajan and Vairamuttu. Abdul Rahman's 'Palviti' (the milky way), Tamilanpan's 'Tivukal karaiyerukinrana' (Islands climb the shores), Kamarasan's 'Suryakanti' (The sunflower), Mira's 'Kanavukal + Karpanaikal = kakitanakal' (Dream + imaginations = papers) and Vairamuttu's 'Tirutti elutappatta tirppukal' (Judgements rewritten) are some of the modern romantic writings in free verse. They are quite different from the early free verses written by N.Pichamurthy and others.

The prose works of Kannadasan like 'Anti shanti arttachamam' (Twilight, dawn and the midnight) too have romantic elements. It is Arinar Anna who broke a new path of writing with alliterations and rhymes, tinged with emotions as well as with revolutionary ideas. He was followed by a large number of writers including M. Karunanidhi.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Tiru. Vi.Ka. (Tiru. Vi. Kalyanasundaranar) both by his writings and speeches developed a new kind of technique in Tamil prose. Simple and short sentences, punctuated with questions and exclamations, marked his writings. Writers like R.P. Sethu Pillai, M. Varadarajan and G. Rajavelu followed him in this type of romantic prose.

In fiction too there are romantic elements to a certain extent. It all started with Pudumaippittan (pseudonym of Co. Viruttachalam), considered the major short-story writer in Tamil. His 'Katavulum Kandasami Pillaiyum' (God and Kandasami Pillai) is a typical example of a romantic short story. Later, he was followed by many writers of whom special mention can be made of Ku.Pa. Rajagopalan, Mouni and Chellappa. Jayakantan, T. Janakiraman, Sujatha and a few more belong to this group of writers.

One wonders if a biography, and that too an autobiography, can be romantic? As far as the Kannadasan's autobiography, Vanavacham (Life in the woods), is concerned, it is certainly more romantic than realistic.

The plays of Anna (Or Iravu) and S.D. Sundaram (Kaviyin Kanavu) are also marked by romantic elements.

In brief, Bharati is romantic in the selection of language and presentation; Bharatidasan in revolutionary thoughts and ideals; the poets of free verse in form and content, vision and symbol; Thiru Vi. Ka. and Anna in prose style; and Kannadasan in self-revelation in his writings as also in his autobiography.

R.K.

ROMANTICISM (Telugu). the romantic movement in Telugu poetry known as 'Bhavakavitvodyamamu' (emotional poetry movement) or 'Navyakavitvodyamamu' (new poetry movement) had been a powerful revolt against classical poetry in the matter of themes, forms, poetic diction and imagery. The mythological themes of the classical poet gave way to the subjective outpourings of the romantic poet. The experiences of common people like a blind beggar and the charms of nature in its varying moods figured prominently in the new poetry. The Sanskrit metre was discarded and indigenous metres like 'Gitam', 'Ataveladi', 'Sisam' and 'Dvipada', and a few metres drawn from folk-songs were chosen instead. The genre of 'prabandha', which was reigning supreme in the classical poetry, lost ground, and 'khandakavyas' (shorter poems), came into vogue. In the matter of poetic diction, words of Sanskrit origin continued to be dominant, and were used freely in an extended or contracted sense. New and quaint compounds like 'nidura vennelalu' (sleeping moonlight) came to be coined with a view to adapting the diction to suit the new sensibility of the poet. Imagery also underwent a change, although the classical images like the spring, flowers, birds, bees and the brook continued to be employed. Even the philosophy of life changed. The Dharma concept of classical poetry became suspect, and free enquiry was evident. The shringara of the classicist gave way to Platonic love. A new patriotic sentiment was introduced, and new literary forms like the elegy and the ode made their appearance.

The beginnings of romanticism in Telugu poetry may be traced to Gurajada Appa Rao (1862-1915), the father of the modernist movement in Telugu literature. Though he was widely known for his play Kanyashulkam, he tried to break new ground in the field of poetry as well. Among his 'mutyalasaramulu' (strings of pearls), a new name given to the folk metre he adopted in almost all his poems, and which has been employed widely by the later poets, 'Deshbhakti geyam', a patriotic poem, reflects the broad-mindedness and the rare insight of the poet.

Influenced perhaps by the short narrative poems of Wordsworth, he composed short story-poems like 'Lavanaraju kala' (the dream of king Lavana), an episode borrowed from 'Jnana Vasishtham' and gave it a new materialistic orientation. Poems like 'Purnamma', with a moving story condemning the social evil of child marriage, and 'Kanyaka' (a tale of girl's self-sacrifice for the sake of the common good), introduce romantic themes for the first time in Telugu. But Appa Rao's romanticism appears to belong more to the intellectual than to the emotional plane, and there was little variation in his poetic diction and imagery from that of the classical poetry but for the free use of colloquialisms here and there. Another major writer who followed the Romantic trend, Rayaprolu Subba Rao (1892-1984), is considered to have pioneered the movement in Telugu poetry. In his poems, for the first time, the emphasis shifts from the verbal sense to the mood conveyed through the lyrical and melodious structure of the poem. His short narrative poems consisting of 100 to 150 stanza each, like 'Lalita' (1909), a free adaptation of Goldsmith's 'The hermit'; 'Anumati' (1910), inspired by 'Dora' of Tennyson; 'Trinakankanam' (1912, a lyric depicting Platonic love between two young lovers who could not marry); 'Kashta Kamala' (1913), the story of two adolescent lovers; 'Snehalata' (1914), based on a real incident in Bengal where a 15-year old girl committed suicide in protest against the dowry system; and 'Svapnakumaramu' (1915), based on the romantic involvement of a youth for his beloved whom he meets in a dream, have all been received well.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

ROMANTICISM (URDU)

The romantic movement in Telugu soon gathered momentum and a band of highly talented poets joined it during the twenties and the thirties. Abburi Ramakrishna Rao (Mallikamba, Uhaganamu), Duvvuri Ramireddi (Vanakumari, Jaladangana, Krishivaludu), Venkata Parvatishvara kavulu (the twin poets), Balantrapu Venkataravu, and Oleti Parvatisam (Ekanta seva, Jalajanjali), Devulapalli Venkata Krishnasastri (Krishnapaksham, Urvashipravasam), Vishvanatha Satyanarayana (Kinnerasani patalu, Girikumaruni prema gitalu), Nanduri Venkata Subba Rao (Yenki patalu), Nayahi Subba Rao (Saubhadrani pramaya yatra. Matrgitalu), Sivasankara Svami (Hridayeshavari), the twin poets, Pingali Lakshmi Kantam and Katuri Venkatesvara Rao (Tolakari, Saundaranandam), Kodali Subba Rao (Hampikshetiam), Vedula Satyanarayana Sastri (Dipavali), Mallavarapu Vishvesvara Rao (Madhukila, Kalyanakinkini), and a score of others are among those who adorned the genre of bhavakavita in Telugu. The romantic movement reached its zenith in Krishnasastri who, overshadowing all the others by achieving a unique harmony between word and sense, came to be regarded as the leading light of the movement. He became a model for modern poets. His Krishnapaksham provoked a classicist to the extent of writing a parody, Shuklapaksham, on it. By his spirited and forceful recitations of modern poems to large audiences and by his impassioned and reasoned orations Krishnasastri stood his ground repulsing the attacks of the classicists against romantic poetry. The Telugu lyric is considered to have reached its perfection in Krishnasastri's Pallaki (The palanquin).

Though considered a classicist in his later years, Visvanatha Satyanarayana made a significant contribution to the romantic movement also. His Andhra prasasti and Andhra paurushamu, hailing the past glory of the Andhras, and his Kinnerasani patalu, a set of lyrics, are landmarks in modern poetry.

Another significant romantic poet in Telugu was Nanduri Venkata Subba Rao, the author of Yenki patalu. Modelled on pastoral poems of Burns, he dealt with the love of a rural couple 'Yenki' and 'Nayudu bava'. The songs were composed in a rustic dialect. The poet could sublimate love to such an extent that the poem prompted certain critics to interpret the couple as 'prakriti' and 'purusha', the primal pair.

The romantic movement in Telugu poetry seems to have spent itself out by the forties, giving place to the later progressive and 'Digambara' Movements in which realism and free verse dominated. But the movement may be said to have served its purpose by widening the horizons of the Telugu poets and ushering in the modern sensibility. As J.B. Kripalani points out, in India the old order never changes yielding place to new. It continues to co-exist with the new. Romanticism in Telugu poetry survives even today in poets like Dasarathi, Narayana Reddi, Bapu Reddi and others, while its traces are discernible even in Sri Sri, the leader of the Progressive Movement and Nagnamuni, the force behind the 'Digambara' Movement.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C. Narayana Reddi, Adhunikandhra kavitvamu (1967); D.V. Krishna Sastri, Palikella Telugu kavitvamu (1951).

B.V.S.

ROMANTICISM (Urdu), as a new mode of imagination and vision, surfaced itself in Urdu at the same time when it emerged in other Indian languages at the beginning of the twentieth century. It combined liberalism in both life and literature, with Bohemianism. It advocated absolute freedom of thought and expression. It also went in for uncontrolled passion, and idealised the life around to the extent of a Utopia. It was not simply an escape from the present, but also a revolt against the traditional, and looked for a new world.

The new mode of imagination and vision was a creation of the national awakening in India, and denoted a particular stage in the country's freedom struggle. By the end of nineteenth century, Indian writers and poets had been disillusioned about the British rule in India. Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941) heralded this new vision. He gave romantic expression to the restlessness of the people. At the same time, Mohd. Iqbal (1876-1938) and Abul Kalam Azad (1888-1957) expressed this consciousness in Urdu poetry and prose respectively. Both were nationalists. Emotional effusion, emphasis on uncontrolled passion, hero worship, reaction against the set pattern, and revolt are the common features of their writings. Nostalgic description of the past and the desire for a utopian future are also common in them.

Iqbal establishes the superiority of creative imagination over intellegence. He creates the world of his poetry with the fusion of rational and irrational powers of human mind, and highlights flashes of orphic insight above rational experience. On this ground he finds the self ('khudi') of Ahraman (Satan) misleading. His favourable symbol, eagle (Shaheen), expresses his fascination for adventure, fearlessness and violent desire. He seems to approve that an eagle pounces on a bird not for lust of blood, but for the pleasure it gets in doing so. It reminds us of Byron who emphasized that the aim of life was not pleasure but the search of pleasure.

In search of glorious past, Iqbal goes back not only to the history of Arab world and look for great personalites there, but also to the corridors of ancient India and seek for an extraordinary character like Rama as an ideal. His hero worship makes him praise Lenin, Hitler and Mussolini in the same breath. His idealism makes him dream of a Utopia and create an imaginary superman (Mard-e-Momin). In this search, he is much nearer to Nietzsche than to Shelley and Keats.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai

The prose of Abul Kalam Azad is a manifestation of romantic egoism, emotional effusion and uninhibited imagination. His projection of self creates an individuality not found in any other prose writer of his time. His repetitive use of first person singular, 'I', can be compared only with the practice of Khalil Gibran and Bernard Shaw. Like many other romanticists, Abul Kalam Azad talks of present with sorrow and grief, as he finds it inconvenient. His dissatisfaction with the present leads him to transfigure the past. He visualises the future of his dream, and finds the present undesirable. This is because he is not ready to mould himself and adjust, but like a romanticist wants to shape the present in the mould of his desire. He writes prose in a heightened language and, thus, lays the foundation of a new style in Urdu prose. He uses this style for the propagation of his nationalist ideals as well which made a deep impact on the Urdu writers.

Romanticism surfaced itself during the freedom struggle when national awakening was subjected to many constraints and contraditions in life and politics. For want of clear understanding of the historic process which consists of complex motives and tasks, the romanticists considered only one factor in the dialectics of history and put excessive stress on it, ignoring other elements, sometimes completely. This one-sided emphasis led them to dream of Utopia. Failure was the natural outcome of this vision which resulted in fatalism, self-torture and eroticism.

Disllusionment caused by unhistoric and undialectical attitude towards life, led some of the poets and writers to self-destruction and glorification of death, etc. Fani Badayuni (1879-1941) became the foremost exponent of this kind of poetry. He glorified death and used symbols and images connected with death, such as the graveyard, coffin, funeral, etc. He considered death more beautiful than life and dreamt of finding it in such a way as if he were in search of his beloved. There is no sufism involved in it, as Fani's imagination remains earthly. That is where a distinction can be drawn between a sufi's desire for death and that of a romanticist longing for it.

In Fani's poetic world these romantic elements reached the point where they tended to be erotic, but they may be traced in a diluted form in the works of many other poets and fiction writers as well. The behaviour of the central characters and the tragic end they meet in the short stories of Niaz Fatehpuri ('Shahab ki sherguzasht', 'Ek shair ka anjam'), Majnu Gorakhpuri ('Zaidi ka hashar', 'Khab-o-khayal', 'Mohabbat ki qurbaniyan' and 'Madfan-e-tamanna'), etc. indicate the same trend.

One of the startling features of Urdu romanticism is the image of a woman, of beauty and love, projected by the writers. Hasrat Mohani (1875-1951) had brought in the family atmosphere of middle classes into Urdu poetry. The image of this earthly beloved is that of a cousin or of a girl in the neighbourhood. This was contrary to the image of a woman projected in earlier Urdu poetry. Now the woman was not for debauchery. The romantics extended this concept and projected woman as a respectable being. Sajjad Haider Yaldram, Khaleeqi, Niyaz Fatehpuri, Hijab Imtiaz Ali, Akhtar Sheeri, Qazi Abdul Ghaffar, all place woman on a higher pedestal and talk of Platonic love and divine beauty. To them the beauty of woman and her love are the essence of the universe. Josh Malihabadi in his poems, 'Kohistan-e-Dakan ki aurat', 'Jamun waliyan', 'Malin', 'Mehtarani', presents a concept of beauty and love which transcends caste and class barriers. This romantic response to the necessity of a social revolution influenced the later progressive poets to a great deal.

The romanticists not only longed for transcendental reality and Platonic love in literature, but also tried to lead that kind of idealized life. The life styles of Majaz Lucknavi, Miraji and Akhtar Sheervani are a few examples. Miraji abandoned his real name and adopted 'Miraji' after the name of his beloved Mira Sen, a girl whom he had probably never met. He remained committed to her for his whole life. Akhtar Sheervani's 'Salam' is more of imagination than real. Khaleeqi considers that women are not made for marriage but for poetry. Niaz Fatepuri was of the opinion that love is nothing but a commitment, and a person trying to meet his beloved on a physical plane is not a true lover.

In criticism, the romantic critics like Abdur Rehman Bijnori, Majnoon Gorakhpuri, Sajjad Husain Ansari and Mehdi Afadi, etc. extended these concepts and attitudes and provided a philosphical basis to creative writers. One of the important features of their writings is that to them criticism is more on a subjective extension of their own self. They seem to be more interested in expressing their own feelings than interpreting the text. This tendency is common in Abdur Rahman Bijnori ('Mahasin-e-Kalam-e-Ghalib') and Majnoon ('Tangidi haashie').

By mid-thirties the national movement had advanced considerably and the future was not so bleak as it had looked at the beginning of the century. The greater awakening heightened the level of consciousness to a degree which gave a fillip to a literary movement called the Progressive Movement.But the flavour, style of expression, images, symbols and idioms created by the romanticists in Urdu did not die down. They got tran-formed into new shades of meanings to give expression to new realities. This can be traced in the early progressive writers and poets clearly. In fact, the begining of the progressive movement was not an end of romanticism. It got revolutionised, although the response of many progressive writers towards new realities remained romantic. In fact, their concept of revolution and social justice was more utopian than real. Even an analysis of the poems written by them on the subject of independence of the country would bear testimony to this fact.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Q.S.

ROOPABHADRATHA (Malayalam) means, literally, the state of being perfect in form, but in the context in which the word gained currency in Malayalam, it meant proper or aesthetically satisfying form as a pre-requisite for any work of art. The word came into vogue when Joseph Mundasseri prefaced his review of Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai's Thottiyude makan with a few remarks on the artistic fusion of form and content. This article appeared in the magazine Mangalodayam (October-November, 1947), later included in the book, Vayanasalayil, Vol.I. Mundasseri cautioned the young and over-enthusiastic writers of the Progressive School against the tendency to neglect artistic synthesis in their writings. He cited a news story released by the Tass Agency and a classic novel by Sholokov as a contrasting pair for illustrative purposes. Soon a controversy started and 'roopabhadratha' was promptly interpreted as the critic's bias in favour of formalism and hence utterly reactionary. Gradually sanity prevailed and sensible writers admitted that the concept is nothing but a reaffirmation of symmetry, harmony and emotional synthesis in works of art. Thus the debate that had started with sound and fury ended on a tepid note.

S.G.N.

ROY, DILIP KUMAR (Bengali/English; b. 1897, d. 1980) was the eminent son of Dwijendralal Ray, well-known dramatist and poet. Himself a novelist, dramatist, poet and musician, he studied mathematics, music and law and travelled widely in Europe and America. Many of his books on music such as Geetashri, Sangitiki, and Suranjali are enriched with musical notations. He had close association with such writers as Romain Rolland and Bertrand Russell, and wrote in Bengali and English his reminiscences of them, viz. Tirthankar and Amongst the Great.

Dilip Kumar wrote a number of novels. The Upward Spiral for instance, is one of his famous novels in English. Most of his novels were inspired by spiritual and philosophical insight. He wrote a long philosophical poem, 'Eyes of Light', based on the story of Prahlad in the Bhagavata. His poems and lyrics were but revelations of his yogic insight, as he had come under the direct inspiration of Sri Aurobindo and stayed in the Pondicherry Ashram for more than twenty years.

Some of his major novels are Du dhara (1927), Aghatan ajo ghate (1956), Aghataner purbarag (1966) and Aghataner sobhayatra (1967). His other works include memoirs, songs, travelogues, and critical writings, such as Anami (1933), Edeshe odeshe (1941), Pratidiner tire (1942), Aurobindo prasange (1942), Abar Vrammaman (1944). Udashi Dwijendralal (1945), Chhayar aloy (1947), Bhagavati giti (1949), Bhuswarga chanchal (1949), Vikharini rajkanya (1952), Tarango rodhibe ke (1959), Mahanuvab Dwijendralal (1966), Dhusar rangin (1967), Yugashri Sri Aurobindo (1967), Madhur murali (1968), Dharma, Vijnan O Sri Aurobindo (1970), Smritir sesh pathay (1974), and Ganga tire gitali (1976). He also published a treatise, Chhandosiki, on Bengali prosody and allied topics in 1940.

It is also worth mentioning that Dilip Kumar Roy was a playwright and translator too. He published Apad, a collection of three one-act plays, namely Apad, Triankik and Jalatanka in 1934; Sada-Kalo, a religious play in 1940; and two other plays, Meera and Chaitanya in 1950. He translated D.L. Ray's famous play Mewar patan (Fall of Mewar), some short novels of Saratchandra Chatterjee like Bindur chhele and Ramer sumati, and Bhagavad Gita into English.

Bi.C.

ENGLISH: Musician, biographer, lyricist, dramatist, novelist, Vaishnavite devotee, Dilip Kumar Roy was all rolled into one. The most fateful event in his life was his meeting with Sri Aurobindo in the latter's Ashram at Pondicherry where he found his true vocation along the path of a bhakta. His English poems, for instance those in Eyes of Light (1948) and The Immortals of the Bhagavat (1958), are suffused with a warmth a la Chaitanya. The longer of the poems are based on the legends of bhaktas like Ambarish, Bali and Prahlad. The issue between Prahlad and his demon-father, Hiranyakashipu, is the theme of 'The Divine and the Devotee', which goes to make up two of the dialogues, the first between son and father and the second between Prahlad and what may by described as 'Godhood'. As a lyricist, Roy is neither a romantic, aping the Victorian model, nor an all-out modernist, obsessed with imagism, ventriloquism and personal symbolism. His is the poetry of what can be called the stuff of soul, relating the vicissitudes in the soul's journey to the divine. Roy has little use for undue literary sophistication or intellectual complexity. Even his verse plays, Sri

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Chaitanya (1960) and Mira in Brindaban (1961), are notable mainly on account of their lyricism rather than as contribution to stage worthiness. In Sri Chaitanya, the great theme moves from 'aspiration' through 'conflict' to 'illumination'. The endless discussions, however, are a drawback, holding up the innate movement of dramatic action. Roy's other published volumes are The Upward Spiral (1949), The Beggar Princess (1955) and Miracles Do Still Happen (1963).

K.M.

ROY, M.N. (English; b.1887, d.1954), outstanding philosopher, revolutionary, political thinker and author, was born in an orthodox Brahmin family as Narendranath Bhattacharya. He adopted the pseudonym Manabendra Nath Roy in the U.S.A. to escape arrest after he had fled India.

After matriculation in 1906, he joined the Bengal Technical Institute at Jadavpur, but his involvement with revolutionary activities hindered his studies. He was associated with the famous revolutionaries of his time, such as Jatindranath Mukherji (Bagha Jatin) and Jadugopal Mukherji. In 1915, he fled India under the pseudonym of Reverend C. Martin and reached Batavia and then went to Japan where he met Sun-Yat-Sen and Rashbehari Ghosh who was in Tokyo in exile at that time. In the summer of 1916, he arrived at San Francisco, and during a stint at Stanford University met both Dhanagopal Mukherji, the revolutionary and Indian English writer, and Evelyn Trent whom he married shortly. About this time he met Lala Lajpat Rai also who offered him some financial assistance. In order to escape arrest he fled to Mexico where he met Michael Borodin, the famous Russian revolutionary and Lenin's lieutenant, who indoctrinated him into Marxism. His literary career began in Mexico when, to eke out a living, he had to write in English and Spanish for the local journals like El Pueblo and El Heraldo. He came to Russia via Spain and Germany, and was introduced to Lenin in 1919 who took an immediate liking for him. After founding the Communist Party in Mexico, Roy went to China in 1926 where he had sharp differences with Borodin and Chinese leaders over the nature of revolutionary tactics. He has himself given a detailed record of these developments in his book Revolution and Counter-revolution in China (1946). At this time (1927) he divorced Evelyn.

At the end of 1930, Roy, again under the pseudonym of Dr. Mamood, came back to India and met Nehru and other leaders of the Congress. He was arrested in Bombay in 1931 and released in 1936. In 1937 he married his friend and associate, Ellen, and brought out the journal Independent India which later changed its name to Radical Humanist. However, he could not get along smoothly with the Congress leaders as he held many of the Gandhian tenets as obscurantist. He supported Subhas Chandra Bose at the Tripuri Congress session and was finally ousted from Congress in 1940.

Roy had a unique charisma which attracted numerous young men and intellectuals and gave birth to the Roy-cult. One of India's profoundest intellectuals, he was a free-thinker to the core and, despite his Marxian background, was aware of its limitations and tried to go beyond Marxism by blending humanist ethics with Marxian tenets. He tried to reformulate the Marxian philosophy as a philosophy of freedom.

His creed of Radical Humanism, which he propounded in New Humanism (1947), was concerned with various aspects of human existence, and he endeavoured to show that it was in man's nature 'to be rational and moral and therefore capable of building a free, harmonious and just social order.' His philosophy mainly issues forth from the basic Marxian tenets of economic historiology, dialectics, and theory of class conflict. Roy was, however, averse to the economic determinism of Marx which he saw as the economic degeneration of man. To the humanist Roy, man is the measure of everything and the individual is the archetype of society.

A great linguist, Roy knew several European languages. A prolific writer, though he scarcely had any formal academic training, he produced some sixty-five books and forty pamphlets, most of them political or philosophical. To a common reader, however, his autobiographical writings like Fragments of a Prisoner's Diary (1941), My Experience in China (1946), Memories (1964) and Men I met may seem to be more interesting. Among his historical and philosophical writings mention must be made of such titles as India in Transition, Beyond Communism, Historical Role of Islam, Science and philosophy, and Reason, Romanticism and Revolution.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Samaren Roy, The Restless Brahmin; Sibnarayan Ray (ed.), M.N. Roy: Philosopher Revolutionary; V.B.Karmik (ed.), Political Biography of M.N. Roy; V.M.Tarkunde (ed.), Radical Humanism.

M.D.

ROY, RAJA RAMMOHUN (Bengali/English b. 1772, d. 1833) was the precursor of modernism in India and the foremost personality in renascent Bengal. Born at Radhanagar in Hooghly district, he studied Arabic and Persian, besides Muslim theology at Patna, Hindu theology at Banaras, and Buddhism in Tibet. Expelled from home for iconoclasm, he travelled widely in India. He started his career with the East India company but finally settled in Calcutta in 1814 when his multi-dimensional activities towards the goal of religious, social and cultural reforms started.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Rammohun Roy wrote extensively in Bengali, English, Sanskrit, Hindi and Persian, and produced nearly thirty major works in Bengali only. He edited the Brahmmunical Magazine in English (1821), Sambad Kaumoudi in Bengali (1821), and Mirat-ul-Akhbar in Persian (1823). His translations of Kenopanishad and Ishopanishad into English and Bengali came out in 1816, followed by the translations of Kathopanishad and Mandukopanishad in 1817. These were part of his major attempt to place the vedantic knowledge within the grasp of common man. An Abridgement of the Vedanta (1816) was another notable work in this regard. In 1817 he published his English pamphlet, The Defence of Hindoo Theism which was a strong vindication of monotheism, written in reply to the attack from an advocate of idolatry. He also published in the same year A Second Defence of the Monotheistical System of the Vedas in reply to an apology for the present state of Hindu worship. It is noteworthy that Rammohun never attacked Hindu religion but only its superstitions and blind beliefs.

Liberal and rationalistic in his approach, Rammohun Roy was the pioneer of enlightenment in modern India. There were three specific features in all his writings—clarity of thinking, logical representation of the problem, and veracity of truth. He admired the true spirit of Christianity in his book. The Precepts of Jesus, which enraged both Hindus and orthodox Christians, and he had to publish Appeal to Christian Public in three instalments in order to reply to the charges made against him. It is worth mentioning here that the publication of the bilingual periodical, Brahmmunical Magazine, was prompted by such replies to missionary attacks.

Most of Rammohun's Bengali writings were prompted not only by socio-religious controversies but also by a spirit of truth and knowledge. Bhattacharayer sahit bichar (1817), a Bengali pamphlet by Rammohun, came out as a result of his reply to the challenges of Mrityunjoy Tarkalankar (1762-1819), an orthodox pandit at the Fort William College who ridiculed Rammohun's views in his Vedanta-chandrika (1817). Rammohun was never so ruthless and motivated in his use of language as were his opponents who frequently abused him in filthy language.

In 1822, he published Chariti prashner uttar in reply to four questions raised by Kashinath Tarka Panchanan, an eminent orthodox Hindu. Again, he published Pathyadan, as a measure to counter the virulent attack by the same pandit in Pasanda-piran. In 1821, he published Brahaman sebadhi as a protest against missionary activities. In 1823 he wrote Padri-sishya sambad, a book in the dialogue form in Bengali, followed by its English translation. The language used in his Bengali books is quite lively and simple. Rammohun's books on the anti-sati campaign were written with a deep sense of respect for women. Apart from his socio-political writing, Rammohun published a grammar of Bengali language. He was the first to write Brahma songs in Bengali.

Rammohun Roy is a unique personality in Indian literature. He happens to be the first English prose writer of his time in Indian-English literature. He will be ever remembered as the father of Bengali prose also. Although the Pandits of the Fort Willian College had produced some books, it was Rammohun Roy who placed Bengali prose on a far more solid foundation. As the earliest maker of Bengali prose, he first introduced firm rules of syntax, avoided jugglery with Sanskritised words and added a note of clarity to language.

Bi.C.

ENGLISH: Social and religious reformer, political and economic thinker, founder of Brahmo Samaj, pioneer of the new education, journalist and champion of a free press, and prophet of internationalism, Raja Rammohun Roy was born fifteen years before the Battle of Plassey was fought and lost. It was India's dark hour, and Rammoohun was destined to see that, out of the dark, the first streaks of new light appeared again. He was to pack so much variegated achievement within his life as to deserve descriptive epithets like 'Augustus of the East', 'Erasmus of India', 'Luther of the Hindu renaissance', 'India's Columbus in the discovery of a new continent of Truth' and 'The morning-star of the modern Indian renaissance'.

He began his serious education with the study of Persian and Arabic at Patna, followed by Sanskrit at Varanasi. An enfant terrible at sixteen, and already married with two wives living, he walked out of his father's house in a mood of protest, travelled widely, accumulated knowledge and wisdom in the hard school of experience, and became a successful man of business with extensive contacts with influential members of the European community. His first book, Tuhfat-ul-Muwahhidin (A gift to monotheists), was in Persian and came out in 1803. Then followed twelve years of service under the East India Company, and during this period he mastered English functionally, and left service in 1814. Then, for nearly twenty years, he embarked upon religious debate, social, economic and educational reform, and continued his ministry on behalf of his motherland in England as well, and died there. In short, he did 'the work of half a dozen giants'. He was basically a religious man, 'no mere Deist or unbeliever, but a loyal Hindu, a Brahmin of the Brahmins, steeped in the lore of the Upanishads and making his life's work the restoration of the Hindu faith to its pristine simplicity' (Esme Wingfield-Stratford). His aim in founding the Brahmo Samaj was, not so much to start a new sect, but rather to unify all India 'through the common worship of the one God by members of all denominations' (as his colleague, Satishchandra Chakraborti, said in 1833). But the religious man was a humanist too, a fearless humanitarian and social reformer. Hence the battle he waged against the monstrous custom of 'sati'. Indeed, his interests and inquiries ranged from the rights of women and the freedom of the press to English education, the revenue and judicial systems in India, the plight of the Indian peasantry and the need for economic development. His whole aim was to awaken his countrymen and make them a new virile people through the integration of their traditional strength with the science and the social and political philosophy of the West. He was of course far ahead of his time, and even visualised the ultimate emergence of a world assembly of nations, and of a world citizenship. And he wrote to Talleyrand the French foreign minister, suggesting the removal of all passport restrictions inhibiting free movement over the whole world. Rammohun was at once an idealist and a practical organiser; and the seer, the reformer and the shrewd man of affairs were united in him and made him the great pathfinder for the puzzled, anguished and enslaved people of his time.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Rammohun's Precepts of Jesus (1820) was one of the earliest published books by an Indian in English. He wrote and spoke on a variety of subjects, in Bengali as well as in English, and if he was resourceful in controversy, he was most persuasive in exposition. His Vedanta sara was published in 1816 in Bengali, English and Hindustani, and it has been described as 'the most original of all his works' (Nalin C. Ganguly). Among his writings was a piece of autobiography, first published in the Athenaeum and the Literary Gazette. During his years in England, he made an impact on the intelligentsia, and was also maliciously caricatured by Thackeray as Rummon Loll in The Newcomes. But, on the whole, he was extensively admired both in India and in England, and his gaunt figure, his noble bearing and his poise of self-possession made people think of him as the living image of Universal Man.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Iqbal singh, Rammohun Roy: A Biographical Inquiry (1958); Kalidas Nag and Debajyoti Burman (ed.), English Works of Raja Rammohun Roy (1946-51); Nalin c. Ganguly, Raja Rammohun Roy (1934); Niharranjan Ray (ed.), Rammohun Roy: A Bi-centenary Tribute (1974); Saumyendranath Tagore, Raja Rammohun Roy (1966).

K.R.S.I

ROY: Also see under RAY.

RUBAI (Kashmiri). There is a tremendous influence of Persian literature on the medieval and earlier modern literature. Almost all the forms of Pesian poetry infiltrated into the poetry of Kashmir, and this infiltration became a permanent feature afterwards. Ghazal, masnavi, marsia, naat, munajat and manaqibat became permanent genres whereas qasida and rubai came at a very late stage. Kashmiri language never enjoyed royal patronage, and so the qasida could not develop. At the same time, both vakh and shruk, the two dominant genres of this literature, had close resemblance to rubai, hence no immediate need was felt to add one more genre of the same type to Kashmiri literature.

Rubai in Kashmiri has been adopted with all the characteristics it had in Persian poetry. It is a quatrain with the rhyme scheme 'aaba' containing a single idea.

Among the poets, who lived up to the end of the fifties of the present century, none, except a few, had written a good rubai.

Mulla Habibullah Hakim (1848-1905) has greatly contributed to humour and is known for his wit. In his poetry we find a few rubais which are mixed compositions of the Persian and Kashmiri phrases, and are full of humour. Abdul Ahad Azad (1903-1948) has also written a few rubais.

Mirza Ghulam Hassan Beg (b.1910) was the first Kashmiri poet who took to the rubai form seriously and published his first volume entitled Rubaiyat-e-Arif in 1960, which received great appreciation. His rubai is perfect both in thought and language. The thought behind his rubai is influenced by socio-political contradictions, economic disparities and mystical experiences.

Though C.R.Nazki (b.1909) is older than Arif by one year, he changed over to the compositions in Kashmiri only in early fifties. Nazki's rubai is in chaste language and almost every word of it has a pun. In his rubais he expresses with candour the political exploitation of the masses. His naat rubais (in praise of Prophet Mohammad) have both originality and devotion. His compilation of rubais entitled Namroodnama was published in 1962 and received appreciation both from literary circles and the general readers.

Influenced by the rubais of Arif and Nazki, Hassan Ali Tanha (1914-1969) and S.A.Jabbar Khamosh Kreri (1912-1973) wrote many beautiful rubais. Tanha's rubais depict his environment, and Khamosh mystically interprets life.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Ghulam Rasool Azad (b. 1915) and G.N.Ariz (1916-1965) have also written a good number of rubais. Ariz's rubais have been included in his Kuliat (1972) which was edited by G.N. Gouhar. Noor Mohammad Roshan (b.1919) has composed poems in both qita and rubai forms in chaste and simple language.

Another great poet who has enriched Kashmiri rubai with mytaphysical intricacies conveying inner experience, is Motilal Saqi. The collection of his poems, Mansar (1979), won for him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1981. It mostly contains his rubais and qitas.

Mo.S.

RUBAI (Urdu) has become a familiar term with the English speaking public since the publication of the Rubaiyat of Khayyam by Edward Fitzgerald. Its English equivalent is 'Quatrain'. Like quatrain, Rubai consists of four lines, but its resemblance to the quatrain stops at a certain point. A quatrain is a stanza, a part of the larger whole, whereas a rubai is a poem by itself. The scheme of rhyming is also different. In rubai, the first, the second and the fourth lines are rhymed compulsorily. In fact, one cannot conceive of a rubai without this scheme of rhyming. There are other forms of poetry in vogue in Urdu consisting of four lines, like 'Murabba' and 'Qita', but they are different from rubai. Murabba is a stanza whereas qita may or may not consist of four lines, and it follows alternate rhyming. But the basic difference which gives a distinct identity to rubai is its metric peculiarity. It is incumbent on a rubai writer to compose rubai in a specific metre called 'Hazaj' within the range of its specified twenty-four metric variations (Zahafat). In short, rubai is a poem of poetry consisting of four lines composed in Hazaj metre within its twenty-four variations with the first two and the fourth lines rhymed.

Like other forms of poetry (i.e. Ghazal, Musaddas, Masnavi, etc.), rubai is also borrowed from Persian literature. The Persian rubai is also called 'Chahar baiti', 'Do baiti' and 'Tarana'. The term 'tarana' suggests that rubai was composed in the earlier days for singing to the accompaniment of musical instruments. However, in Urdu, rubai is the only current term without its Persian alternatives. Mohd.Quli Qutab Shah, the earliest Urdu poet, whose collection of poems was compiled in his lifetime, was also the first rubai writer in Dakani Urdu. His contemporaries, Wajhi and several other Dakani poets down to Vali and Siraj Aurangabadi, composed rubais, but none of them specialised or excelled in this form.

In the Northern dialect, which later came to be known as Urdu, almost all the Delhi poets of the earlier period, like Hatim, Mir Taqi Mir, Sauda, Khwaja Mir Dard, Ihsanullah Khan Bayan, Ashraf Ali Fughan, Mir Hasan, etc. composed rubais along with other forms, but none excelled in rubai writing. Among the Delhi poets of the later period, Momin Khan Momin gave more attention than his contemporaries, Ghalib and Zauq, to rubai writing.

Momin's rubais smack of his ghazal idiosyncrasies with a few rubais touched with remorse for his earlier mundane approach. Rubai, however, came to be regarded as a respectable form of expression by the 'Marsiya' writers of the Lucknow school. The two poets of eminence of Lucknow who gave a new lease of life to rubai are Anis and Dabir, who were initially and basically marsiya writers. Prior to them, rubai embodied sentiments and thoughts of heterogeneous nature, ranging from erotic to spiritual, but it was Anis and Dabir who projected rubai as an extension of marsiya to express cogently and briefly the moral sentiments and spiritual message underlying the events of Karbala, leading to the martyrdom of Hazrat-e-Imam Hussain which they described vividly in minute details in the form of marsiya. Two collections of rubais, Anis-ul-Akhaque and Rubaiyat-e-Anis composed by Mir Anis were compiled and published. Rubai now became distinctly didactic and a vehicle of moral teaching.

In the wake of the first war of independence in 1857, Urdu poetry underwent drastic changes under the influence of the Syed Movement. Urdu poetry was no more regarded as a source of amusement. It was purposefully linked with the socio-political changes that were fast taking place in the new emerging society. Social and educational reforms were on the anvil. Hali, the most prominent among the vanguard of Syed's Movement, wrote short poems in the form of masnavi and exploited fully the form of musaddas to propagate the new ideas. Obviously, he could not be oblivious of rubai as a vehicle of his ideas. He has composed a number of rubais with a specific purpose to extol social virtues, steadfastness, perseverance and other moral qualities required for reforming a decadent society under the aegis of the British rule.

Akbar Allahabadi, the noted humorist, who was well-known for his bias against the British culture which was trickling into the Indian society as a result of Syed's educational policy, wrote many rubais to lampoon and ridicule the new generation, as he did in his poems. His rubais, with the exception of a few which are imbued with sufistic ideas, have the same characteristics for which he is well-known. Akbar had a mastery over employing rhymes in his poems to create humour. He, therefore, was at ease with rubai composition which requires skill in the use of rhymes. Other poets like Amir Minai, Pyare Sahib

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Rasheed and poets of the lesser order did compose rubais, but they have little literary value. Among the rubai writers who belonged to the first and the second half of the twentieth century, are Fani Badayuni, Josh Malihabadi, Firaq Gorakhpuri, Jagat Mohan Lal Rawan, Yagana Changezi, Asar Sahbai, Simab Akbarabadi, Mahir-ul-Qadiri, Tilokchand Mahroom and last but not the least, Amjad Hyderabadi, who deserves special mention as a rubai writer.

Fani has composed about two hundred rubais which are characterised by deep pessimism which is the hallmark of his ghazals. He did not lose sight of the abject conditions of the rural masses suffering from acute poverty and misery. His rubais on Kashmir are an instance to the point.

Josh Malihabadi, the well-known romantic as well as revolutionary Urdu poet, paid special attention to rubai. Junoon-o-hikmat is the collection of his rubais, and several of his rubais find place in his anthology, Simoom-o-saba. His rubais cover a wide range of topics from lyrical to revolutionary. His lyrical rubais betray Omar Khayyam's superficial influence. Some of his rubais are ostensibly philosophical. Josh had a great command of expression and his rubais bear a testimony to it.

Firaq Gorkhpuri's contribution to rubai can hardly be ignored. In fact, he added a new dimension to Urdu rubai. The collection of his rubais, Roop, will go down in the history of rubai writing as a milestone. Roop consists of rubais which depict vividly and portray skilfully the traditional Hindu housewife against the backdrop of the ancient Hindu culture. His description of the housewife, now performing puja, now engaged in daily chores, now rocking the cradle of her baby, now adorning herself before the mirror to welcome her loving husband, is superb. Firaq has successfully tried to imbue his rubais with the characteristics of Hindi and Sanskrit poetry. He is the first Urdu poet to employ with success the Sanskrit words in his rubais.

Yaas Yagana Changezi, a well-known ghazal writer, evinced keen interest in composing rubais which are included in his anthology, Ganjeena. These rubais are mainly didactic and reveal his piquant style as manifest in his ghazals.

Another name to reckon with in the history of rubai in Urdu is that of Jagat Mohanlal Rawan. Although Rawan has written many poems and ghazals in Urdu, he will always be remembered as a rubai writer. His anthology, Rooh-e-Rawan, includes his rubais as well. Some of his rubais dealing with the ephemeral nature of human life are superb and are often selected in various Urdu text books.

Tilokchand Mahroom's collection of Urdu rubais, Rubaiyat-e-Mahroom, shows the poet's keen interest in rubai. His rubais cover many topics, but lack vigour. Similarly, Asar Sahbai has many collections of rubais to his credit, but they are highly conventional in style and as such hardly deserve mention. His name-sake Asar Lucknowi also used rubai for his creative expression, but failed to rise above his mediocre level as a poet.

The history of Urdu rubai will be incomplete without a reference to Amjad Hyderabadi's excellent rubais. In fact, he is the only Urdu poet who has so far specialised himself in rubai writing, and at the same time, excelled in it. He has been aptly described as 'Living Sarmad'. The Persian literature has to its credit many poets like Omar Khayyam, Ab-us-Saeed Ab-ul-Khair and Sarmad, whose fame rests solely on their rubais, but Urdu had none to match them as a rubai writer till Amjad appeared on the literary scene and emerged as a matchless rubai writer. Though his rubais deal with spiritual and esoteric experiences as a whole, they are unique in their appeal and have a permanent literary value. Some of his rubais abound in allusion to the Quranic verses and Hadith, yet they retain their literary flavour and have a general appeal, irrespective of the extra-literary leanings of the reader.

Coming to the present times, rubai cannot boast of a bright future. With its metric restrictions and the rigorous scheme of rhyming, it has failed to find favour with the new generation of Urdu poets. The modern trend in Urdu poetry is to do away with rhymes, metric formalities and other extraneous devices which, according to the protagonists of new Urdu poetry, hamper creative expression. However, those poets who still adhere to the conventional pattern, use qita in place of rubai, because the former also consists of four lines without the metric restrictions and rigorous rhyming pattern of the latter.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Farman Fatehpuri, Urdu rubai: Fanni-o-tarikhi irtiqa.

I.J.

RUDRA SUDHANIDHI (Oriya), a prose work on an imaginary subject but copiously arranged in poetic form, was written in the 16th century by Narayanananda Abadhuta Swami, supposed to be a widely read scholar, a wandering mendicant and 'yogi', and a great devotee of Lord Shiva.

The story of Rudra Sudhanidhi is as follows: Ananga Padmakar is a king who is childless. He worshipped Lord Shiva for a child. Lord Shiva, pleased with him, was inclined to grant him his prayer and send one of his Ganas (devotees) to earth as an heir to the king. It was, however, a problem for the Lord as to which one of the ganas he should send to the earth below. In order to test the ganas Shiva asked Parvati to create out of her spirit an exquisitely beautiful maiden. Accordingly, Trailokya Mohini, the enchantress of the three worlds, was born. Her ravishing and vivacious beauty affected Abhinava Chaitanya, one of the ganas, and he fell a victim to her charms. Lord Shiva commanded Chaitanya to go down to earth as a human being as punishment for his imperfect devotion. Abhinava Chaitanya, visibly perturbed at the thought of the miseries of earthly life, begged the Lord for mercy. Shiva was moved and consoled him that he would be born as the son of a benevolent king and a pious queen, and that after spending his life as a noble king, he would ultimately return to Him. Accordingly, Abhinava Chaitanya was born to king Ananga Padmakar and his queen, and was named Rudra Sudhanidhi, while Trailokya Mohini was born as Avidya Mrityu Sanjivani Karani. Right from the beginning Rudra Sudhanidhi had to experience untold sufferings. While in his mother's womb, he had to confront Adabhuta in a discourse. When born, a Yogini tried to destroy him and when he attained youth he had to face a formidable rival in Kamananda Yogi for the love of Avidya Mrityu Sanjivani Karani.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

This prose work may be divided into eight parts:

(a) The birth of Mohini Kanya, the test of the Sidhas and the fall of Abhinava Chaitanya; (b) the conception of Queen Sashi Prava, wife of king Basudha Mandan; (c) the birth of Rudra Sudhanidhi, his education, and search for a bride; (d) the episode of Kamananda Yogi; (e) the story of Mrityu Sanjivani Karani, Kamananda Yogi's attempt to abduct the bride and his proposal to Sudhanidhi; (f) the arrangements for the 'Swayambar' of the bride, and her fascination for Rudra Sudhanidhi; (g) their marriage; (h) conflict between Kamananda Yogi and Rudra Sudhanidhi.

The victory of Sudhanidhi is attributed primarily to his devotion to Lord Vasudev, an incarnation of Vishnu. It appears that his very birth was ordained by Lord Shiva to uphold the supremacy of the Vaishnava faith.

Lord Shiva is the principal deity of this mythological story and is the most adored god of the writer. Both the hero and the heroine in the story are devotees of Lord Shiva. Thus elaborate praise of Lord Shiva fills the narrative. In the book, however, Shiva has been portrayed not only as an all powerful god but also as a close associate of Rama and Krishna. The description of Abadhuta in the book reminds one of the spiritual significance of the Abadhutas in Indian religious scriptures. Their dress, their conduct and behaviour are peculiar. In Rudra Sudhanidhi, Abadhuta is identified as one smeared with ashes, with a drum in hand, and serpents intertwining his shoulder. Rudra Sudhanidhi was a Shaivite before his birth and a Vaishnavite after birth.

What strikes one most on reading this work is its rich poetic language, ornamental style and allegorical theme. The use of prose in the work is poetry-oriented and achieves a new dimension in terms of intensity and imaginative fervour. In the spiritual context the story indicates the total surrender and dedication of the lover to his beloved. As a work of art, its style and presentation have been interlaced with similes and metaphors. Written in the 16th century, it was a trend-setter—a powerful book which yet retains its appeal and beauty.

G.M.

RUDRABHATTA (Kannada; b.1185) was the first Brahmin poet brought up in the Vedic tradition, who produced a Kannada epic Jagannatha vijaya in the classical champu form with religious and devotional content. It is a 'mahaprabandha' (a great epic) comprising eighteen cantos based on the story of Krishna as narrated in the fifth part of Vishnupurana. Rudrabhatta is credited with another work called Rasakalike (A bud of poetic sentiment) on aesthetics, but it is not available. It is, however, on Jagannatha vijaya that Rudrabhatta's reputation is firmly established.

In the middle of the twelfth century, due to socio-religious upheaval caused by Basaveshwara, a new form of poetic and mystical prose called 'vachana' came into vogue. The champu tradition which had already lost its creative lustre and glory of the tenth century was further weakened. But at the close of the Virashaiva movement around 1170, there was a revival of the champu form. Inspired by renewed devotion towards Jina, Vishnu, Krishna and Shiva, some poets, of whom Rudrabhatta was one, sought to propagate their respective faiths in the congenial atmosphere created by the Hoysalas. Virabhattala II (1173-1220), whose patronage Rudrabhatta enjoyed, was a mighty emperor, with powerful Cholas in the south as his feudatories. This was a period of outstanding achievements in the arts and in literature. Rudrabhatta occupies a unique place in the age, his being a lone but effective voice crediting Vaishnavism with a universal vision. Rudrabhatta lived probably at Dwarasamudra, in the present Hassan district, capital of Viraballala II. The poet belonged to the 'Smarta Bhagavata' tradition having faith in the identity of Hari, Hara and Brahma—the triad being three aspects of the one supreme Parabrahma. Rudrabhatta seeks to embody in the story of Krishnavatara, (The incarnation of Krishna) the knowledge of the highest truth by establishing in his heart 'Paranjyoti Mukunda'—the Supreme Light that is Krishna—through 'Kavyasamadhi' (poetic contemplation.) The poem is charged with devotion. The poet recreates the episodes of Krishnavatara, transforming the original purana into an epic-poem endowed with an artistic form. Deeply read in the classics of Sanskrit and Kannada literatures, Rudrabhatta draws upon them spontaneously. But whatever he borrows he enriches by imprinting his own personality on it. He has a sense of drama and can recreate powerful scenes. So episodes like the clash between Garuda and Skandha, and the winning of Parijata are powerfully dramatised.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Rudrabhatta's diction is learned, heavily laden with tough Sanskrit words, which reflects the trends of the times. But he is equally adept in the use of 'deshi' (indigenous Kannada) words skilfully fused with limpid Sanskrit.

Rudrabhatta calls himself a 'Sukavindra' (a master among good poets) and it appears that he was known by several other titles. His Jagannatha vijaya influenced gifted poets of the Bhakti school like Kumaravyasa and Lakshmisha, and 'Haridasas' like Purandara and Kanaka. His dramatic episode 'Parijataharana' possibly inspired the creation of the popular Kannada folk-drama Parijata.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gundmi Chandrasekhara Aital, Rudrabhatta; P.V.Narayana, Champu kavigalu—samanyanige sahitya charitre (Bangalore, 1975); R.Narasimhachar, Karnataka kavicharita, Vol. I (Bangalore, 1977); R.S. Mugali, Kannada sahitya charitre (Mysore, 1978); R. Samasastri (ed.), Jagannatha vijaya.

S.R.M.

RUDRABHATTA (Sanskrit; 10th c.), authour of Shringaratilaka, seems to be different from Rudrata. Shringaratilaka is divided into three chapters; the first deals with nine 'rasas' including 'shanta', 'bhavas,' 'nayakas' and 'nayikas'. The second deals with 'vipralambhashringara' and ten stages of the development of love, and the six means (upayas) of winning over an offended man. The third treats of other rasas and four vrittis. Shringaratilaka may be considered a treatise on love, intended to serve as a psychological as well as a poetic guide, giving elaborate analysis of the various moods and sentiments belonging to the area of erotics and poetics. The book seems to follow Rudrata (Kavyalankara) closely, and so many scholars have tried to identify its author Rudrabhatta with Rudrata himself.

There is another Rudrabhatta also who is the author of Rasakalika, dealing with rasa in detail. He is later than Dhanika whom he quotes, and is earlier than Mallinatha and Vidyanatha who use him. He is quoted clearly in the Kannada work Rasaratnakara of Salva (16th c.). Six verses from Rasakalika are quoted in Vasudeva's commentary on Karpuramanjari. He refers to four varieties of 'uddipanavibhavas'. Following the Natyadarpana, Rudrabhatta says that rasas do not always lead to the experience of pleasure in the reader/spectator, but can cause pain too, as in the case of 'karuna' and 'bhayanaka' sentiments.

K.K.R.

RUDRAKAVI, KANDUKURI (Telugu; c. 1480-1560). There were, perhaps, three poets with the same name Rudrakavi in a Vishwabrahama family of Kandukuru, a town in the present Prakasham district of Andhra Pradesh. The first Rudrakavi who wrote stray verses (chatu padayas) is said to have belonged to the court of king Krishnadevaraya of Vijayanagar during 1509-1530. He was capable of composing extempore verses in both Telugu and Sanskrit but, except for some occasional verses, there is no literary composition ascribed to him. The second Rudrakavi (c. 1480-1560) is the most famous of the three. He is believed to have been one of the eight celebrated poets in the court of Krishnadevaraya. A copper-plate inscription, dated 1558, conferring the grant of a village to this poet by Ibrahim Qutab Shah, the Nawab of Golkonda, is a proud possession of the family. The third Rudrakavi whose verse was quoted by the famous gramarian Appakavi (b. 1656) was a contemporary of Guntupalli Bhaskarmantri (b. 1620). Of these three, it is the second Kandukuri Rudrakavi whose contribution to Telugu literature is the most outstanding. He was a Shaivaite and a staunch devotee of Kali from whom he claimed to have received the gift of poetry. He is the subject of detailed analysis here.

This second Rudrakavi appears to have written several poems, but the three works extant, Sugriva vijayamu, Nirankushopakhyanamu and Janardanashtakamu have secured for him a prominent position in the history of Telugu literature.

Sugriva-vijayamu, believed to be his first poem, is the oldest available 'Yakshagana' (folk-play) in Telugu. Rama is the hero of the play which deals with the killing of Bali and the coronation of Sugriva, events that appear in the Kishkindha canto of the Ramayana. Pathos is the dominant emotion, and Tara's agony on separation from Sita, and the entrusting of Angada to Sugriva's care are treated in a most moving manner. The poet dedicated the work to Lord Janardana, the presiding deity of the temple in Kandukuru.

Nirankushopakhyanamu, a narrative poem in four cantos, belonging to the genre 'prabandha', deals with a social theme, the redemption of a profligate youth by the grace of God. Nirankusha leads a dissolute life, and once challenges even Shiva to play a game of dice with him. He wins the game and obtains the celestial courtesan Rambha as his mistress from the Lord. He receives boons from Indra also, and is finally reformed and attains liberation.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The theme of the redemption of a rake, treated earlier by Srinatha and Tenali Ramakrishna, later recurs in several literary works in Telugu. Rudrakavi's poem is noteworthy for its descriptions and felicitous style.

Janardanashtakamu, a cluster of eight finely-etched verses addressed to Lord Janardana of Kandukuru, is erotic in nature and deals with the attempts of a love-lorn heroine to win the love of the Lord.

On account of their consummate artistry, these three poems of Rudrakavi are considered notable contributions to the three genres in Telugu literature.

The two other poets bearing the same name, Rudrakavi, have left behind works of a minor nature and critics are agreed on the view that the author of the three major works discussed above belonged to the 15th and 16th centuries and was associated with the royal courts of Vijayanagar and Golkonda.

A.R.R.
B.R.R.

RUDRATA (Sanskrit; *c.*9th c. AD), the author of Kavyalankara, belonged to Kashmir and was an advocate of the 'alankara' school of aesthetic theory. Rudrata, also called Satananda, was the son of Bhatta Vamuka, and seems to have been an elder contemporary of Anandavardhana, the exponent of the 'dhvani' theory of poetics.

Rudrata's Kavyalankara consists of sixteen chapters and 734 karikas in Arya metre; fourteen karikas found after chapter XII (verse XII), dealing with eight kinds of 'nayikas', are said to be later interpolations. He was the first writer to classify figures of speech pertaining meaning according to certain underlying principles, namely, 'vastava' (fact or feasibility), 'aupamya' (comparison), 'atishaya' (exaggeration) and 'shlesha' (double entendre). The figures of speech pertaining to sound are brought under five types: 'vakrokti' (equivocation), 'shlesha' (double entendre), 'chitra' (pictorial effect), 'anuprasa' (alliteration) and 'yamaka' (repetition of sound pattern). He described sixty-eight alankaras (excluding sub-varieties). His definitions of some of these are different from those of Bhamaha and Dandin and have been abandoned by later writers who were , however, influenced by him. He devotes four chapters (XII-XV) to the treatment of 'riti'.

In Kavyalankara, Rudrata added 'shanta' and 'preyas' to the eight rasas. He considers poetic genius, erudition and training as the essential requisites of a poet. He deals with five main figures of speech pertaining to sound, and among figures pertaining to meaning he deals with twenty-three based on 'vastava', twenty-one based on 'aupamya', twelve based on 'atishaya' and ten based on 'shlesha'. 'Doshas' or defects are treated, but not 'gunas'. Among the rasas shringara is treated in detail, varieties of the hero and heroine, the ten stages of the development of love, the six ways of winning over an offended heroine, etc. Various types of literary composition are dealt with in the last chapter.

K.K.R.

RUKMINI BIBHA (Oriya) is a poetical work by Kartika Das who belonged to the later 16th century. The work is based on Padma Puran and Bhagabat, and is marked by vigorous and chaste diction. It offers a new meaning and interpretation to the well-known story of the marriage of Sri Krishna with Rukmini, the daughter of the king of Vidarbha, and in a way it can be considered a pioneering work of poetry in medieval Oriya literature. The book is divided into ten cantos, depicting Krishna's valour in winning the hand of the beautiful princess Rukmini and shattering the evil designs of Shishupal, the lusty and ambitious prince of Chedi. Both in content and in style the poet gives evidence of a strong lyrical impulse and subtle power of poetic narration, besides artistic observation of the contemporary social norms such as related to marriage, courtship and chivalry. It also provides a wide range of social realism in spite of the mythological background and an allegorical presentation of a true lover's quest.

The first canto opens with a prayer to Lord Jagannath, and with an indication of the theme of the Kavya. The second canto introduces the subject matter. In the third canto Sri Krishna learns from the messenger about the extraordinary charm and beauty of Rukmini and spends every moment thereafter in thought of her. The fourth canto is devoted to arrangements about Rukmini's 'swayambar' and the intransigence of Rukman, Rukmini's brother, who was eager to get her married to Shishupal. Krishna, though uninvited, arrives at Vidarbha, to the great chagrin of Rukman and the friends. In the fifth canto Rukmini is seen expressing her resentment and annoyance over the parental proposal of her marriage to Shishupal. She reveals her strong liking for Sri Krishna and sends him a letter through a Brahmin massenger. In the sixth canto Sri Krishna receives Rukmini's letter and decides to interfere in the Swayambar. The seventh canto is devoted to the celebration of the unsuccessful wedding ceremony, the description of Sishupal in the groom's dress, and the abduction of Rukmini by Krishna in his chariot.

The wedding of Sri Krishna and Rukmini is planned in the eighth canto, and it is performed with great joy and merriment in the next canto, followed by the intimate conjugal love of the young couple. The tenth and the last canto describes the departure of guests and invitees, including all the Gopies, Nanda, Yashoda, etc.

The various characters appearing in this handy readable literary work, such as Sri Krishna, Rukmini,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Balaram, Vishma, Rukman, Shishupal and Jarasandha have been portrayed faithfully, befitting their position and status. The character of Shishupal is of immense interest showing him as a villain vanquished in love. The description of nature highlights the physical charm of Rukmini, the paragon of beauty and an embodiment of love and intellect, true of a royal princess like her.

The text was first collected from a palm-leaf manuscript source and published by Prachi Samiti with notes around 1930.

Rukmini Bibha, it may be said, is one of the rare medieval literary pieces that acted as a soure of inspiration for creative writing in Oriya.

G.M.

RUKMINI HARAN (Rajasthani) by Saiyan, a Charan of the Jhoola branch, deals with the abduction of Rukmani at her own request by Krishna. There are 'duhas' and 'chansar gahas' in the beginning, and the entire text is composed in 'jhaptal' metre. A number of episodes from Krishna's life, such as Putana vadha, Bal leela, Nag daman, Govardhan dharan, have also been described along with the abduction of Rukmini which forms the main theme. The prominent 'rasa' is 'veera' (valour) supported by 'bhakti' (devotion). It has been a very popular work along with Nagdaman, another poem of high calibre. Saiyanji was patronised by the prince of Idar (Gujarat) who granted him a village, named Kuwawa. His father Swamidas was also a resident of Idar. Prince Kalyanmal was his fast friend who honoured him with an award of a lakh of rupees. There are many anecdotes about Saiyanji and his devotion to Krishna. It is said that Akbar compared Rukmini haran with Beli Krishna Rukmini ri by Rathod Prithviraj and declared the former a better work. He also composed some Dingal lyrics which speak of his poetic talent. But his Nagdaman is, perhaps, the most effective of all his works and surpasses others in poetic beauty.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: P.L.Menariya, Rukmini haran (Jodhpur, 1964).

Raw.S.

RUKMINI MANGAL (Rajasthani) is a narrative poem of about 265 verses by Padam Bhagat who composed it during 1493-1500. The poem is also called Kishanaji ro vyavalo. Like its source the Bhagavata, it is recited, sung and heard for weeks together by people. Its oldest manuscript, dated 1612, is available at Abhaya Jaina Granthalaya, Bikaner. Its three editions have been published by Harprasad Bhagirath (Bombay), Shah Shivakarana (Indore), and Shyamalal Hiralal (Mathura).

The poem begins with a prayer to Ganapati. The poet confesses to have been inspired by Rukmini. Later, he prays to Saraswati and sings hymns in praise of other gods and goddesses.

The story begins with the description of Raja Bhishmaka of Kundanpur and his children. Narada visits the Raja's palace. Rukmini bows with reverence to him. Narada gives her a boon that she would get a husband like Krishna. He prophesies at the same time in the Queen's presence that Shishupala would be the fittest suitor for Rukmini. This makes the plot complex.

The poet adds to the story the episode of Rukmini's bathing in the pond and her being saved by Krishna from being drowned, and thereafter Krishna's pledge to marry her.

Message for the marriage of Rukmini is sent to Shishupala. Rukmini informs Krishna about the 'Swayamvara' who instantaneously reaches Kundanpur. When Rukmini goes to the temple to pray, Krishna lifts her to his chariot and blows his conch shell. He does not carry her off secretly. A war ensues and Krishna comes out victorious. Krishna and Rukmini are married with full religious rites. Devaki, Vasudeva and Subhadra welcome the couple. At the end the importance of Mangala is shown.

The editors ascribe the poem to a Vaishya poet, though the old texts say that he was a Teli (oil-monger).

Padam Bhagat's poem is secular in spirit. It describes the rural life of Rajasthan. Narada is the agent of conflict. The queen of Raja Bhishmaka takes Rukmini's side, while the sister-in-law of Shishupal advises him to refrain from marrying Rukmini.

The poem is essentially erotic with an admixture of the heroic sentiment.Though narrative, it is a sustained song. Its language is simple and descriptions vivid.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hiralal Maheshwari, Rajasthani bhasha aur sahitya (Calcutta,1960); Manohar Sharma, Rukumini mangal; M.L.Menaria, Rajasthani bhasha aur sahitya (Prayag, 1948); P.L. Menaria, Rajasthani sahitya ka sandharbha sahitya Krishna Rukmini vivaha sambandhi Rajasthani kavya (Jaipur, 1969).

P.L.M.

RUKMINI SWAYAMVARA (Marathi). The episodic poetry (Akhyan kavya) in the ancient Marathi literature is enriched by 'Swayamvara kavya' (narrative poems on marriage by choice) on Sita, Draupadi, Rukmini, Damayanti, etc. Amongst them the narrative poems on Rukmini swayamvara are the most popular ones. The very fact that we have thirty-two kavyas on Rukmini swayamvara in medieval Marathi composed by different poets indicates the popularity of this episode. The appeal, perhaps, is due to a rare combination of devotion and love in Rukmini's character.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The source material for this episode has been drawn by the poets from the Bhagawat (canto X), Harivansha puran, Vishnu puran, etc. Some thirty and odd poetic works broadly show two different approaches, one devotional and the other eruditional.

The first among the writers of Rukmini Swayamvar kavyas in point of time, is poetess Mahadaisa or Mahadamba (1233-1302), a disciple of Chakradhar, who composed and sang Dhavale (AD 1286) in the role of a companion to bride Rukmini during the festival of Krishna-Rukmini Wedding opera. Dhavales were songs, eulogizing the bridegroom's accomplishments. Mahadamba's Dhavale in 83 stanzas combines lyricism with emotional appeal. She wrote another Swayamvara kavya, Matruka Rukmini swayamvar (in 110 'abhangas'). The matruka composition follows a pattern - the first letter of each line will be in alphabetical order – a device which perhaps detracts from the poem's spontaneity.

Mahadamba was followed by the scholar-poet Narendra who wrote his Rukmini swayamvara kavya (1292) in 829 stanzas in 'Ovi' metre. It shows his erudition and epic style which is largely ornamental, full of imagery and picturesque descriptions. Here the strain of devotion is less dominant, but the poem, because of its high poetic excellence, acquired a place among the seven works of the Mahanubhava sect on which the story of Krishna had a great impact. Later, some of the poets of the 17th and 18th centuries like Narasinha, Santosh muni and Kavi Dimbh composed poems on Rukmini swayamvara, but all of them are regarded as minor poets. Their work, including the epic poem of Narendra, were written in a code language (sanketik lipi), unknown to the people in general, barring the few enlightened followers of the sect until recently.

The trend-setter of the episodic poetry in Marathi literature was the saint-poet Eknath (1533-1599) who composed his Rukmini swayamvara in 1711 stanzas in Ovi metre in 18 'prasangas'. Although the source is the Bhagavat, his poem is an expression of his independent creative genius. It became widely popular in view of its graphic descriptions of the royal marriage and humorous and witty dialogues throwing light on the social life of the times. Eknath's Rukmini even writes a love-letter to Krishna, while in the Bhagavat she sends only a message orally through Sudeva. The outstanding feature of this poem - in fact, of all his compositions - is his use of metaphysical metaphors (adhyatmikrupak), profusely employed through out the poem, even in the description of war and marriage ceremony. The marriage of Krishna and Rukmini is treated here as the union of 'Jiva and Shiva'. Sometimes the metaphors make the composition an intellectual exercise. Eknath's influence on the later poets like Samraj, Vitthal, Nagesh, etc. is clearly evident in their Rukmini swayamvara, but their works lack the harmonious blending of events, philosophy, imagination, devotion and humour as found in Eknath's poem.

Samraj, who followed Eknath, calls his work Rukmini haran instead of Rukmini swayamvara. Although he attempted to imitate and follow the accepted norms of epic composition, his work is not recognized as an epic.

Last in the lineage is poet Moropant of the 18th century, who had a fondness for rhyme and Sanskrit compounds, but in Rukmini swayamvar uses altogether a different style. He has written this work in the form of dramatic monologue in Ovi metre. While reading this poem one is reminded of Mahadamba and her excellence. The poem brought Moropant good recognition.

H.S.Sh.

RUKMINIHARANA KAVYA (Assamese). According to Guru-charita-katha, Bhakti-pradipa and Rukminiharana-kavya were two works composed by Shankaradeva (1449-1568)after his return from the first pilgrimage at the age of about forty-two. That the kavya is an early work of the poet is scarcely doubted. It is full of poetic exuberance and descriptive elaboration. Its language is sometimes colloquial but always idiomatic. Partly for this popular cast of language and style, and partly for the pleasant subject-matter appropriately treated, this is one of the most popular of Shankaradeva's works. Shankaradeva is not always faithful to the original texts (Bhagavatapurana and Harivamsha). He interweaves the two versions of the story of the abduction of Rukmini by Krishna, as it is given in the Harivamsha, II (chs. 59-60) and the Bhagavata-purana, X (chs. 52 and 54) and adds freely from his own imagination so much so that in his poem we get almost a new version of the puranic story. It also envisages in an original manner the Assamese way of life, and social manners and customs, especially those connected with marriage. These are reflected in the narrative at various places. The social interest of the work centres round the domestic life of an Assamese Hindu family, of which Shankaradeva finds a prototype in that of Bhishmaka. Besides the hero and the heroine, there are other figures who show Shankaradeva's power of characterization - Rukmi, Rukmini's eldest brother, haughty and irreverent; the queen Shashiprabha with all concern for her daughter Rukmini; Sumalini, the faithful and loving nurse of the heroine; Vedanidhi, who runs Rukmini's errands and provides a great deal of laughter with his boasts but weak nerves; Bhishmaka, a good king, lenient father and devout Vaishnava. Shashiprabha and Sumalini are Shankaradeva's creations, while Vedanidhi is the name given to the Brahmin mentioned in the Bhagavata.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The cities of Dwaraka and Kundina are portrayed in a detailed manner. The individual encounters between the Yadava heroes on the one hand and Shishupala and his associates on the other are described almost independently of the Harivamsha and the Bhagavata-purana. These descriptions occupy a large space, though their length is redeemed amply by their vigour.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Lakshminath Bezbaroa, Shrishankaradeva (Calcutta, 1934); Maheswar Neog, Shankaradeva and his Times (Gauhati, 1964).

M.N.

RUKMININADHA SASTRY JALASUTHRAM (Telugu; b. 1914, d.1968), sometimes known as 'Parody Sastry' or only 'Jalasuthram', was born in a Vaidiki Brahmin family, and had traditional education in a Sanskrit school at Chittiguduru. He joined the 'Navya Sahitya Parishat' founded in the tradition of Sahiti Samithi. Slowly, he established himself as a writer of parodies. He joined All India Radio, was the editor of Vani, and later in charge of its literary programmes. He did not remain a mere Sanskrit Pandit, but learnt English and understood various literary forms. In his early life Sastry drifted towards communism, and later became a devotee of Ramana Maharshi of Arunachala. He raised a literary controversy when he claimed that it was not Gurazada but Gomatham Srinivasacharyulu who had written Kanya shulkam. Besides stories, plays and criticism, he also wrote poems, including parodies. Sarat poornima (1983) is a volume of his stories and Jaruk Sastry parodies, a book of parodies. He did not get his works published in his life-time, hence they were brought out together in a haphazard manner. He wrote fifty 'Aryas' in Sanskrit about 'para shakti' which remains unpublished. He tried his hand at several forms of prosody, with Adam-Eve story, which were published in Bharati, a literary monthly. His comparative study of Uttara Ramayana, one by Kankanti and the other by Tikkana, broadcast over All India Radio, is a work of critical excellence.

He wrote two parodies on 'Scissors cigarette' and dedicated them to those who hated him and his poetry. Sri Sri and Arudra wrote 'Rukkuteshwara shatakam' and dedicated it to Jalaluddin Rumy (i.e.Jalasuthram). Jalasuthram was the pioneer of parody in Telugu. Kodavatiganti Kutumbarao says this about him: 'Jalasuthram knows every writer of renown thoroughly. There is no better hound than him who can unearth weaknesses in men and their writings.'

V.Sa.

RUPA GOSVAMIN (Sanskrit; c. 15th c.). Rupa Gosvamin represents one of the noted six Gosvamins of Vrindavana, responsible for the propagation of the Chaitanya cult and the Vaishnava faith in the country. Of the two brothers, Sanatana and Rupa, and their nephew, Jiva, whose literary productions far outweigh those of other philosophers affiliated to the Chaitanya school in range, depth, quality and magnitude, there exists a more detailed and reliable record. In his abridged commentary on the Bhagavata, Jiva gives us a detailed account of the family, as also a list of the principal works of Sanatana and Rupa. From this detailed account, it is known that the ancestors of Rupa Gosvamin migrated from Karnata to the east, and ultimately settled on the bank of the Ganges at Navahatta, identified as modern Naihati. Later, one of the descendants moved to Vanga country (East Bengal) and setted near Jessore. Sanatana, Rupa and Anupama alias Vallabha happen to be the three sons of this descendant. Both Sanatana and Rupa held high official positions at the Muslim court of Gauda, and settled at village Ramakeli, near Gauda. Sanatana received the title 'Sakar Malik' from the court and Rupa that of 'Davir khas'. Later, Chaitanya too gave them new names.

Rupa Gosvamin has to his credit a number of poems, dramas, farcical plays and treatises on literary criticism, among which mention may be made of Hamsaduta, Uddhavasandesha, Ashtadashachchhandas, Utkalikavallari, Govinda virudavali, Premendusagara (all poems, mostly devotional); Vidagdha-Madhava and Lalitamadhava (dramas); Danakelikaumudi (farcical play); and Bhaktirasamritasindhu and Ujjvalanilamani (both works on literary criticism). Apart from these works of repute, Rupa has to his credit a number of other small works, belonging to other genres. It is also said that Rupa composed eleven verses and handed them over to Krishnadasa Kaviraja for elaboration. This elaboration assumed ultimately the shape of Govinda-lilamrita emanating from the pen of Krishnadasa Kaviraja.

The credit of giving a systematic treatment to bhakti-rasa goes to Rupa Gosvamin, who analyses the emotional aspects of devotion, highlights its psychological and rhetorical aspects and places devotion at par with other emotions recognised in the traditional works on Sanskrit poetics.

In his two Sanskrit works on Vaishnava rasashastra, namely Bhaktirasamritasindhu and Ujjvalanilamani, Rupa Gosvamin analyses the details of the religious sentiment of bhakti and shows how it is transformed into rasa by applying the principles of adjudication, enunciated by orthodox Sanskrit poetics. The turn, thus, is given not only to the old theroy of conventional poetics, but also to the religious emotion underlying the old Vashnava faith. In describing the dominant feeling of the bhakti rasa, Rupa Gosvamin points out the love of Krishna and says that through its appropriate excitants (anubhava), ensuents (vibhava) and auxiliaries (vyabhicharibhava) this love is raised to a relishable state in the mind of the devotee, who thus occupies the position of the refined reader, endowed with appreciative genius in the new scheme.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Rupa Gosvamin defines religious devotion as the 'harmonious pursuit of Krishna, freed from all other desires and unconditioned by cognition and will'. In his commentary on this profound definition, Jiva Gosvami explains the implication of each and every term and says that desire, freedom from which is highlighted, refers to desire for earthly enjoyment, as also that for liberation. After describing the different types of religious devotion, Rupa arrives at the highest type of bhakti, namely 'prema-bhakti' which is really the most mature state of bhakti itself. At this stage, the emotion solidifies into the sentiment of love, and then the soul experiences a profoundly deep loving attachment to the deity. Rupa describes the different stages through which this devotional love grows and attains maturity.

Since bhakti-rasa is the only emotional mood in the scheme of Rupa Gosvamin, he adopts a new principle of categorising this rasa, and classifies it first into two types: the primary (mukhya) and the secondary (gauna). While the quietistic (shanta), the parent's sentiment (vatsalya) and the erotic sentiment (madhur or ujjvala) constitute the sub-divisions of the primary emotion of devotion, the comic (hasya), the marvellous (raudra), the heroic (vira), the tragic (karuna), the furious (raudra), the frightful (bhayanaka) and the disgustful (vibhatsa) are comprehended under the category known as the secondary emotion of devotion.

The contribution of Rupa Gosvamin lies in establishing bhakti-rasa as the emotional mood par excellence and in showing that the recognised types of emotional moods are capable of being comprehended under this all-absorbing rasa.

The second work, Ujjvalanilamani, describes 'Ujjvala' or madhur-rasa in its details and analyses the basic feeling, as also the different excitants, ensuents and accessories of this mood. In conformity with the Vaishnava theology Rupa accepts Krishna as the ideal hero and proceeds to describe the various moods, aspects and situations from the ground of the erotic sentiment existing between Krishna and the gopis. This love is surely not an earthly one; the sport, also, is a divine one. Rupa Gosvamin asserts that this feeling of Krishna is brought to a state of relish in the heart of the devotee by means of appropriate vibhavas. In this work Rupa proceeds to describe the characteristic features of the different types of the hero and the heroine. The ordinary classification is followed, but a new classification is also admitted from the peculiar theological point of view of the Vaishnava faith. The work also contains a detailed discussion on the permanent feeling (sthayibhava) of the Madhura rasa, and Rupa's treatment in this regard is entirely original.

Rupa's literary activity falls mainly in the first half of the sixteenth century AD, though Danakelikaumudi, Hansaduta and Uddhava-sandesha seem to have been composed in 1495 before he was blessed by Lord Chaitanya.

R.M.

RUPAKA (Sanskrit), as a generic term for drama, came into vogue in the ninth and tenth centuries AD. In Natya Shastra Bharata has used the word 'natya' in its place. Ten types of rupakas have been defined by Bharata and the later dramaturgists. Dhananjaya, in his Dasharupaka (Treatise on ten rupakas), discusses each type and subjects all of them to a detailed analysis. The ten varieties of drama are: 'nataka', 'prakarana', 'samavakara', 'dima', 'ihamriga,' 'prahasana', 'bhana', 'vyayoga', 'vithi' and 'utsrishtikanka'.

Of the ten rupakas, nataka is the most important, because it is the most typical and representative form, which fully illustrates the conventional rules laid down for drama in general. Other varieties of drama are defined chiefly by the enumeration of their points of departure from nataka. Accordingly, nataka has a well-known plot comprising five to ten acts and a celebrated hero of noble nature (dhiroddhata). The introductory scenes and the five 'sandhis' are properly arranged. The main rasa is either shringara, (the erotic) or vira (the heroic). Violent scenes of battle, death, and revolt of a kingdom are prohibited on the stage.

Prakarana differs from nataka only with regard to its theme and the hero. The plot can be imaginary or historical carrying a social theme and the hero can be a minister, a brahmin or a merchant. The remaining features are the same as in nataka. The well-known examples of prakarana in Sanskrit dramatic literature are Shudraka's Mrichchakatika and Bhavabhuti's Malatimadhava.

A samavakara has divine characters, with twelve heroes, including gods and demons. It is called samavakara because various themes are scattered about in the play. Bharata in Natya shastra mentions Samudra manthana (Churning of the ocean) as a typical samavakara. Dima is usually divided into four acts. Dima is dominated by celestials like Gandharvas, Yakshas, and evil spirits like Bhutas, Pretas, Pishachas, etc. The main sentiment is raudra (the furious). Bharata gives the example of dima in Tripuradaha. Ihamriga is also dominated by vile and arrogant characters; its recurrent theme is that of a hero in pursuit of a woman. Vatsaraja's Rukminiharana, dealing with Krishna's abducting of Rukmini, is an example of ihamriga.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Prahasana and bhana are plays characterised by the basic sentiment of hasya (the comic). Prahasana, a farcical play, is of popular origin and vogue. The subject-matter of prahasana is the dramatist's invention, and so there is considerable freedom for the writer. Dasharupaka classifies prahasana into three sub types–'shuddha' (regular), 'vikrita' (modified) and 'samkirna' (mixed). Prahasana deals with comic situations and characters of every kind, but violent manners are excluded. Bodhayana's Bhagavadajjukiya and Mahendravikrama Varman's Mattavilasa are two examples of prahasana. Bhana is a one-act comic play in which a single character describes the roguish exploits engaged in by himself or someone else.

Vyayoga is a one-act play having a well-known subject-matter and hero. The rasas are bold and striking, as in the case of dima. It usually represents a combat. Bhasa's Madhyamavyayoga is an example of vyayoga in Sanskrit. Vithi resembles bhana in its depiction of acts, junctures and subdivisions, but here the main rasa is shringara. Usually there are only one or two characters in vithi. Utsrishtikanka has an imaginary story conceived by the dramatist himself. The main rasa is karuna (the pathetic) and the hero is a man of ordinary qualities. The dramatic conventions like sandhis correspond to that of bhana, and it includes a descriptive speech on a battle-scene, lamentations by women, and the depiction of ultimate victory or defeat.

Among rupakas, bhana, vithi, anka, prahasana and vyayoga may be designated as one-act plays. Some scholars regard them the most primitive of the types out of which the other complicated types grew. Besides these ten, dramaturgists give a number of other variations as well as sub-variations (uparupakas), which are operas or ballets with different themes and modes of presentation.

R.T.

RUPAKA KAVYA (Apabhramsha) is allegorical poetry in which the whole story is narrated through metaphors and symbols. It was a new trend in medieval Indian literature. Though the Jaina literature has an old tradition of allegory that has been in vogue long before their use in classical Sanskrit literature, it was followed in Prakrit-Apabhramsha kavyas with a new pattern. In Bauddha and Jaina literature, obviously, a 'Shramana' or saint has to struggle internally for a triumph over sex instinct, and therefore, he is known as Kamajita or Marajita. Rati and Kama are recurrent symbolic characters in Indian literature.

The Mayanaparajaya chariu of Harideva is a famous allegorical poem in Apabhramsha. It is divided into two 'sandhis' (cantos). The work is slender as it is composed in 118 kadavakas only. The composition is said to belong to the thirteenth century. There is a struggle between the Jaina saint and the sex-passions, which has been illustrated through symbols. Jinendra's virtues are piety and religion, while those of Kama are impiety and irreligion. The virtues of Jinendra are not systematically enumerated, whereas Kama makes mischief with the help of Mohaniya and other Karmas. In fact, Kama is a symbol of Moha. Moha is the prime minister, and Mithyatva the commander-in-chief. The story can be interpreted in the following mannar:

King Makaradhvaja is a symbol of Moha that dwells in the city of emotions. He has two queens, Rati and Priti. His durbar is attended by warriors like Salya and Garava. Raga and Rosha are two messengers who threaten Jinendra and report the matter to Kama. Kama gets ready for a battle. He collects great warriors like five Indriyas, seven Vyasanas, etc. On the other hand, Jinendra commands Samvega to prepare for the battle. Five Samitis beat the war drums whereby warriors like Mahavratas, Dharmas, Tattvas, etc. get ready. Samyakatva is appointed commander-in-chief. Jinendra's paraphernalia is impressive. He is riding an elephant of Kshayika Samyaka-darshan; twelve Anuprakshas are his armour, and Samadhi is his mace. Bhavyas (the gentle quality in men) greet him. At that time Sarasvati recites 'mangala' verses, and Daya blesses him. Samjvalana Kashaya advises Kama not to fight, but Moha fights a desperate battle at Kama's command. Rati feels nervous and requests Kama not to risk fighting Jinendra for securing Siddhi. The battle starts in right earnest, and finally the arrow of Tattvaruchi brings Mithyatva dead on the ground. Then Moha confronts Jnana and Darshana. Ultimately, Kama flees, and Moha is crushed by Dhyana. Kama is defeated and Jinendra wears the ornament of Kavala-jnana. The marriage of Jinendra with Siddhi is celebrated with great pomp.

Thus, the whole story is allegorical. Various figures of speech have been used in the poem. The style is, of course, symbolic and the diction lucid and simple. The poem abounds in epigrams and maxims. Among the metres employed, Vastu and Duvai metres need special mention as these are the poet's favourite.

Poet Buccharaja's or Valha's Mayanajujha and Santosha tilaka jayamala are also referred to as Apabhramsha rupaka kavya, but these are, in fact, old Rajasthani poems. Jiva manahakarana samalapa katha of Somaprabhacharya may be considered an allegorical poem in Apabhramsha. Actually, it is not a separate composition. It is an intergral part of Kumarpalapratibodha, composed mainly in the Prakrit language. Some parts of the poem in

Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Apabhramsha deal with the story showing the conflict between the senses and the mind (mana). Mana holds all the senses responsible for making the soul guilty. On the other hand, the senses blame Mana to be responsible for creating all sorts of trouble. In the story the King symbolises the soul, the Queen the Buddhi, the Prime Minister the Mana, and the king's officers the senses. Thus, it is quite clear that the story mentioned here is in an allegorical form.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hiralal Jain (ed.), Harideva: Mayanaparajaya chariu (Bhartiya Jnanapith, Varanasi); Harivansha Kochhada, Apabhramsha-sahitya (Bharati Sahitya Mandir, Delhi.).

D.S.

RUPAKA KAVYA (Prakrit) is allegorical poetry that can be defined as 'a form of art which presents a second meaning beneath the surface meaning. It is an expanded metaphor in which the characters, action, or ideas stand for some others, for a system of ideas with the meaning implied, not expressly stated.' There are a number of poetical works, especially narrative, in Prakrit literature that can be termed as allegories. It was developed in the form of metaphors and symbols. The style of symbolic narratives in the Ardhamagadhi canonical literature attracted many a subsequent author and became immensely popular in later literature.

In Sanskrit literature, Rupakas with a great deal of action and dance were popular. According to Vishvanatha, Sanskrit plays are divided into two great classes: (i) Rupaka (principal dramas) in ten sub-types and (ii) Uparupaka (minor dramas) in eighteen sub-stypes. It may be noted that the Prakrit rupaka kavya is quite different from the Sanskrit one. The style of the Prakrit rupaka poetry is distinctly allegorical. In the narrative, folk-tales, characters, episodes and incidents are used with a view to expressing a hidden principle or doctrine. The 'Vanika katha' may be quoted here from the commentary of Dasaveyaliya suttam:

A poor man went in search of fortune to a distant land. He reached Ratnadvipa and collected some precious jewels there. On his way back home, being afraid of robbers, he carried some pebbles in his hands, and started moving like a mad man. He continued shouting that Ratna Vanika (the possessor of jewels) was going alone. Reaching a dense forest, he found himself very thirsty. Looking up, he noticed a small muddy pool. Shutting his eyes, he drank its water without much forethought.

In this small tale we find a number of symbols. 'Ratna' or jewel is a symbol of 'Ratnatraya' (Right faith, right knowledge, right conduct); robbers stand for worldly passions; the muddy water signifies food. Ratnadvipa is a symbol of human life, as human beings alone are capable of attaining the three attributes of self.

There is also another tale entitled 'Ghata-chhidra' (A pot with holes) in which the interaction between soul and ultra-microscopic particles of matter through mind, speech and body is called yoga, and that is the symbol of Asrava. To stop the hole with a lump of clay or contemplative union with one's own self stands for samvara; Ghata (pot) signifies sadhaka (practitioner).

One comes across many tales of this type in Vasudevahindi (AD 6th c.) by Sanghadasagani. Samaraichchakaha by Haribhadrasuri (AD 9th c.) is another symbolic tale in which it is demonstrated how a soul, under the influence of passions, goes to hell, and another, having righteous emotions, soars up to heaven. In both these texts we find a parable which is generally known as 'Madhubindu' in Jaina literature, and which is illustrated as the 'man in the well' in world literature. The theme of this folk-tale is as follows:

A poor man was pursued by a wild elephant and a demoness in a dense forest. He could not climb up a banyan tree. So he jumped into an old well and clung to the reeds for support. Below him were four deadly cobras, and in the centre a boa-constrictor and two rats gnawing at the roots of the clump of reeds. The wild elephant dashed against the banyan tree. A honeycomb on the tree was shaken with the result that the bees began to attack the man. A few drops of honey fell into his mouth which he licked and desired for more, forgetting his troubles.

In this parable the man is a symbol of the soul; his wanderings in the forest stand for four conditions of existence, the wild elephant signifies death, and the demoness, the old age. The banyan tree stands for liberation; the well for human existence; the snakes for four passions (anger, pride, deceit and greed). The clump of reeds stands for the span of one's life; the two rats for night. The honeybees are the various diseases; the boa-constrictor is hell; and the drops of honey stand for momentary sense-pleasures.

This form is further enriched by Udyotansuri in Kuvalayamala kaha. We have also a remarkable allegorical exposition in the work, Upamitibhavaprapanchakatha (AD 906) in Sanskrit by Siddharshi, which was followed by many writers in Prakrit. Actually, these are tales for the 'Sansari-jiva' (worldly people). A wide range of the Jaina doctrines find in this form elucidation of allegory.

D.S.

RUSWA, MIRZA MUHAMMAD HADI (Urdu; b.1858, d.1931), an eminent Urdu novelist, was born in a family of the Irani immigrant warriors. His father, Agha Taqi, relinquished the army and lived mainly on income from property and estates, learnt English, and was conversant with mathematics. Mirza Muhammad Hadi in the beginning received education from his father who taught him Persian, astronomy, mathematics and elementry biology. He also learnt Unani medicine, Arabic, logic and calligraphy from eminent scholars and practioners of these arts. He joined Thompson Engineering College, Roorkee in 1875, acquired Overseer's Diploma and was appointed Overseer in the Railways. After changing over a number of teaching jobs, he finally joined Reid Christian College as teacher where he taught for 30 years till 1919. Ruswa established Ishraq Press and published the fortnightly philosophical journal, Ishraq, and the literary and religious journal, Alhukm. In 1899, he published two novels, Umrao Jan Ada and Junun-i-Inte. Both these novels were based on the biographies of two main characters portrayed by the author. The first novel was published under the pen-name of Ruswa, and it immediately got so much popularity that the author became known as Mirza Ruswa which was never used as a pseudonym by the author earlier. Other novels written by Mirza Mohammad Hadi include Sharifzada Zat-i-Sharif, Ashfa-i-Raz (Lucknow, 1896), Khuni shahzada (Lucknow,1921) and Akhtari Begum (Lucknow, 1924). He also published Urdu translations of T.J.De Boer's The History of Philosophy in Islam, O. Kulpe's An Introduction to Philosophy, William Mc Dougall's An Introduction to Social Psychology, G.F. Stout's The Groundwork of Psychology, H.W.D. Joseph's An Introduction to Philosophy and An Introduction to Logic in two volumes, Aristotle's The Nocimachean Ethics, Plato's The Phaedrus, Lysis, The Protagoras and The Republic. He was also interested in music for which he compiled a notation system.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Mirza Muhammad Hadi married four times and was survived by two sons. He was a scholarly person and had mercurial temperament. As a critic, he made significant contribution, especially to the theory of criticism, through his articles.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Khushwant Singh and M.A. Husaini, The Courtesan of Lucknow (Calcutta,1963); Maimuna Begum, Mirza Muhammad Hadi Ruswa: Swaneh hyat wa adabi karname (Lahore, 1963); Mohammad Hasan, Mirza Ruswa ke tanqidi murasalat (Aligarh, 1961); Zahir Fatehpuri, Ruswa ki novelnigari (Rawalpindi, 1970).

M.H.

RUYYAKA (Sanskrit; 12th c.). After Mammata, Ruyyaka may be regarded as the most representative systematizer of Indian poetics. He hailed from Kashmir and was the son of Tilaka, who wrote a gloss on Udbhata's Kavyalankara samgraha.

Apart from the masterpiece Alankarasarvasva, Ruyyaka alias Ruchaka wrote such important works as Sahityamimamsa, Vyaktiviveka-vyakhyana, Harshacharita-varttika, Kavyaprakasha sanketa, Natakamimamsa and Alankaranasarini. The last two are lost, as also the gloss on Bana's Harshacharita. While P.V.Kane, on the positive evidence of Jayaratha (author of a commentary on Alankarasarvasva, again from Kashmir (c.1220), observes that the anonymous Sahityamimamsa, published from Trivandrum is really Ruyyaka's, V.Raghavan thinks that it cannot be his as it accepts Bhoja's view of rasa in preference to the dhvani theorist view.

Ruyyaka seems to have been the teacher of Mankha, who wrote the epic Shrikanthacharita. And according to the tradition of the Kerala commentator, Samudrabandha, the pupil Mankha was himself the author of the vritti portion of his teacher's Alamkarasarvasva sutra. This appears to be unfounded and based on the fact that some citations from Mankha's poem occur in the work as illustrations.

Ruyyaka is seen as a staunch advocate of 'dhvani' and defends Anandavardhana brilliantly even while overtly explaining the charges levelled by Mahima Bhatta against Ananda in his gloss on Vyaktiviveka (available only in fragment). His theoretical allegiance to the dhvani doctrine is equally clear in his masterly resume of the controversies raging about the soul of poetry in the beginning of his Alankarasarvasva. But the Sahityamimamsa is just an eclectic work, playing down the importance of dhvani and compiling useful information from varied authorities like Bhamaha, Udbhata, Vamana, Rajashekhara, Bhatta Nayaka, Kuntaka and Bhoja. His commentary on the Kavyaprakasha is also remarkable for its brevity and consummate scholarship.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R.C.Dwivedi, Alankaramimamsa, (Delhi, 1966); Edwin Gerow, Indian Poetics (Wiesbaden, 1977); P.V.Kane Histroy of Sanskrit Poetics (Bombay, 1951); V. Raghavan, Bhoja's Shringara Prakasha, (Madras, 1963).

K.Kr.

RYE MADHU (Gujarati; b. 1942), full name Madhusudana Vallabhadasa Thakkar, is a talented fiction writer and playwright. He lived in Calcutta for some years and was engaged in business. Later he shifted to Ahmedabad and tried his hand at advertising. A few years ago he migrated to the U.S.A., where, besides taking care of his job, he has been editing a weekly for the Indians settled there.

Rye started his literary career while in Calcutta. By then two authors from Calcutta, Shivakumar Joshi and Chandrakant Bakshi, had already made their mark as writers. For a young writer like Rye, it was both an advantage and a handicap. Rye did benefit by their guidance and encouragement. For a lesser writer it would have been much difficult to grow out of their influence, but Rye came to his own with his first publication, Banshi namani eka chokari (1964), a collection of short stories. This was followed by Chahera (1966), a novel. Both these works received favourable reviews and Rye became a much talked-about author. Two more collections of short stories, Rupakatha (1972) and Kalasurpa (1973), followed.

Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

As a short story writer, Rye is not so much interested in the narration of incidents as in the depiction of the inner workings of the mind of his characters. Most of his characters refuse to accept the ready-made solutions of problems; they rather prefer a direct confrontation with their own self and with the world at large. Rye's narration is powerful and direct, and he has an eye for the minutest details. His language is crisp and fresh, and mostly free from distortions or intentional aberrations.

Some of Rye's short stories have a common character, Hariyo. He is both a simpleton and a scoundrel. Just as an old bald man represents the common man in the cartoons of R.K. Laxman, Hariyo represents an average middle class man of Gujarat. He suffers his agonies and ills not grudgingly, but smilingly. In some of his other stories, Rye has tried to evolve a new form, which he calls 'Harmonika'.

Chahera, his first novel, was an existentialist work. It is a story of a mutilated young man, Nishada, the protagonist of the novel, who travels from the so-called moral world to the so-called immoral world. He tries to sustain himself amidst the onslaughts of life and wants to see the real face of man, but confronts at every step the masks that hide the real face. His second novel Kamini (1970) is based on his play Koi pana eka phulanum nama bolo to and employs the technique of a play within a novel. The two worlds, the real and that of the play, are not only interconnected, but they interact upon each other. Sabha (1972) and Sapabaji (1972) are his other novels. His Kimbala revansavuda (1981) is set in the tormented society of the present-day U.S.A. In none of these novels, however, does Rye surpass his earlier work Kamini.

Though Rye has published only two full-length plays Koi pana eka phulanum nam bolo to (written 1970-1974) and Kumarani agashi (1975), his contribution to Gujarati drama and theatre is quite valuable. Both these plays have been translated into Hindi and staged successfully. Rye has been awarded the Narmada Suvarnachandraka for Kumarani agashi. His most popular play so far has been Santu rangili (1976) which is an imaginative adaptation of George Bernard Shaw's famous play Pygmalion. It has been staged very successfully in Bombay as well as in Gujarat. His Ashvathama (1973) is an anthology of his one-act plays.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dipak Mehta, Kathavalokana (1978); Raghuvir Chaudhari and Radheshyam Sharma, Gujarati navalakatha (1972); Suman Joshi, Chandrakant Bakshithi phero (1973); Utpal Bhayani, Drishyaphalaka (1981).

D.B.M.

S

SAAB, NAIMA (Kashmiri; b. 1800, d. 1880), original name Naim, was a disciple of Soch Malyari, who lies buried at Qarra-Fali Mohalla, Srinagar. He used to live in the neighbourhood of his relative and younger contemporary, Shams Faqir (1843-1904), an excellent mystic poet. Naima worked in a shawl-embroidery workshop where Shams Fakir joined him to earn his living.

Naima's poetry mostly consists of 'Vatsun', erroneously termed by some critics as ghazals. His poetry comes out with refreshing and attractive expression, with an overt appeal of monotheism, as is the case with Sufi poetry. His mystic terminology is simple, and the style lucid and free from ambiguity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.L. Kaul, Studies in Kashmiri (1968); M.A. Kamil, Sufi shairi, Vol. I. (1964).

S.R.P.

SABAD (Punjabi). There are two significant connotations of the word 'Sabad' in Punjabi literature. Just as the hymns of Tuka Ram and Namdev are known as 'abhang' in Marathi poetry. the hymns of Mira Bai and Surdas as 'Bishanpada' in Hindi poetry, all the hymns of the Adi Granth, irrespective of the poets, are known as 'Sabad'. The second connotation has a religious and philosphic significance. Among five 'tanmatras' (physical organs), i.e. 'Shabda', 'Sparsha', 'Rupa', 'Rasa', 'Gandha' (sound, touch, colour, taste, odour), sabad has a distinct position. It is an attribute of 'akasha'. The sabad in the Adi Granth pertains to the sound vibrations of the word uttered by the Guru (Guru-sabad), the 'mantra' given by the Guru to the seeker. The Guru is a divine personality and a mantra given by him to a devotee is, thus, itself a divinity. The sabad is a 'bija mantra' and the 'bija' (seed) is sown in the body, for it has the power to purify the aspirant. If the subad is recited continuously, its sound will lead the aspirant to eternal bliss. The Adi Granth does not believe in any other mantra except the name of the Lord. A few examples from the Adi Granth will give an insight into the nature of the sabad. In the words of Guru Amar Das, the sabda is the quintessence of the saint whose utterances are the truth. Guru Nanak Dev puts this important question: How can we cross the ocean of 'Samsara' without sabad? He also says, 'Sabad is the Guru and the attention the disciple.' He says again: How can a worshipper of mammon (sakta) realise the Lord without his concentration on the sabad? Without this concentration he goes through the cycle of births. Sabad of the Guru is the 'Sabad' of the Lord. Even this sabad, i.e. bija mantra or the name of the Lord, is called 'Sabad Brahm'.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Kahan Singh Nabha, Gur shabad ratnakar mahan kosh (Patiala, 1960); Surendranath Das Gupta, A History of Indian Philosophy (Cambridge, 1966).

S.S.K.

SABAD (Rajasthani). When we consider 'Sabad' poetry, we ought to bear three things in mind: (a) The term is a derivation from the Sanskrit word 'shabda'. The Veda embodies the shabda; it is ultimate knowledge. Therefore, sabad also means knowledge. (b) The Vedic 'shabda' is considered 'apaurusheya' for the very reason that the word (shabda) is not man made, but has been created by God. In the Natha and Sant sects, the Guru is akin to Brahma, and the Guruvani (saying of Guru) is called 'Sabad' or 'Sabadi'. (c) The Vedic shabda is also ultimate 'power' and needs to be apprehended with single-minded faith. Similarly, Guruvani is power in life, transcending the realm of logic. Rightly, therefore, one of the compositions of Goraknath is called Sabadi. Ordinarily, the teachings of Gurus are called 'Anabhavani' (Anubhavavani), because they are grounded in the personal experience of saints. The saints were not, in fact, creators of literature, but devotees engaged in self-realisation.

The sabads of Gurus embody their teachings; they are spontaneous effusions of their experience in a lyrical form. The task of compiling the Guru's 'vani' was largely the obligation of the disciples. Included in the 'Anabhavni' are 'chhands' written on numerous subjects, and they were ordinarily called 'Sakhi' or 'Harjas' which could be sung in various ragas (melodic patterns of Indian classical music). A sakhi is then a composition constituting the guru's experiences. They are set mostly in dohas, though there are exceptions to this practice. The sakhis composed by the Vishnoi saints are set in numerous kinds of chhands. The Harjas is concerned with the yearnings of the self and the glory of God, and emphasises the recounting of the name of the Lord. In these poems the stanzaic pattern is based on the recurrence of rhyme.

Besides these compositions grouped under Sabad, we have folk-songs, dealing with the worship of the 'formless' God, which are also included among sabads. The lyrics composed by the gurus belonging to the Jasnathi tradition are also known as sabads.

The sabad has been understood in a somewhat different sense by the Nath sect; it denotes compositions that embody an 'infinite naad' that pervades the universe. For this reason, the Nath sect regards 'shunya' (void) as a synonym of sabad, the sound. In Hathyoga pradeepika, 'Shunya' and 'Poorna' have been used in the same sense. The naad or shabda is the source of creation, and represents the highest knowledge. Shunya or sabad thus comprises spiritual knowledge, personal experience, guru's teachings and exposition of doctrines.

The language of the compositions of the Nath saints is mainly Khariboli with a prominent blend of Rajasthani. Most of the copies of manuscripts, which embody these preachings, have been procured from Rajasthan. Apart from the Sabadi of Gorakhnath, the Sabadis of many other Nath gurus too have been compiled and published. These include, among others, the Sabadis of Ajaypal, Gareebji, Gopichand, Charpatnath, Jalandhar, Dattatreya, Deval, Nagarjan, Prithvinath, Balnath, Bharthari, Mahadev and Ramchandra (See Nath siddhhon ki baniyan). These works are mainly didactic and doctrinal. It may, however, be mentioned that the authenticity of several of these Sabadis is doubtful.

The list given above is not comprehensive. There are also available many other works, some of them lyrical compositions of the gurus; but they are not known as Sabadis. In Rajasthan the Vishnoi, Jasnathi, Niranjani, Nimbarka, Dadu, Laldasi, Goodada, Charandasi, Ramasnehi, Alakhia, and other sects are quite well known, and they have made significant contribution to this form of literature. Unlike the other sects, the Nimbark and Charandasi sects are devotees of the 'Sagun' God (God, with form and attributes) as against the formless one. At Salimabad in Rajasthan, Acharya Parashuramdev established the seat of the Nimbarka sect. He wrote remarkable devotional works on both the aspects of the Lord, but it would be incorrect to treat them as sabad poetry. Similarly, the teachings of Haridas Niranjani, Dadudayal, Santdas, Laldas and Lalgiri are chiefly concerned with the worship of the formless God, but they too do not fall into the category of sabad poetry. Again, the term Sabad does not cover the teachings of the Ramasnehi sub-sects, represented by Dariyav, Ramcharan, Hariram and Ramdas, though they stressed the worship of the formless. The teachings of Jambhoji, the founder of Vishnoi sect, and of Jasnathiji, the founder of Jasnath sect, have as their theme the worship of the formless, but with an orientation towards the worship of the 'Sagun'. Their poems, were however, grouped under sabads. In fact, there are no clear-cut guide-lines which can define with any precision as to which poems are sabads and which are not.

Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In his lifetime, Jambhoji composed numerous 'sabads', though only 123 of them are available. From the point of view of form and structure, all sabads are not similar. They have a lyrical and rhythmic pattern, set in the Vachinika style. The language of these works is the dialect of Marupradesh as spoken in the countryside in the 16th century. Compilers and scribes have used terms like 'Siddhantvani', 'Jambhoji ra Sabad' and 'Sabad' for the sayings of Jambhoji and they cover a variety of themes. The predominant note, however, is moral or spiritual, e.g., 'I am Brahma' and 'He is one'. Jambhoji wrote what he had to say, with brevity and clarity. And he made full use of the dialect of the common people in the countryside. This is his distinctive quality as a preacher and writer. The goal of Sabadvani is self-realization as well as the well-being of the people. It is expected of a man to perform his daily chores, reciting the name of the Lord in quiet.

Jasnathji, too, must have composed many sabads, but at present only 52 of them are available. His language is also native Rajasthani. In his preachings there are descriptions of miracles performed by Rama and Krishna, exaltation of devotees, creation of the universe, destructibility of the mundane world, opposition to the killing of living beings, importance of charity and kindness, self-realization and recital of the name of the Lord.

The lyrical padas of the acharyas belonging to the Jasnath sect have been circulating among people, mostly in the oral form. One reason for describing them as sabad is the tendency among the people to apply the term to the lyrical padas on the worship of the impersonal God.

Some of the composers of Sabads may be mentioned here—Lalnathji, Dudoji, Chaukhnathji, Panchoji, Devoji, Rustamji, Sarvanji, Paloji, Harji, Mohan, Dayalnath. It is worth noting in this context that there have been over a hundred gurus in the traditon of Jambhoji but their lyrical padas are known as sakhis and not as sabads. The structure of these sakhis ensures that they can be sung in various ragas and raginis.

The lyrical padas are widely in vogue among the people. The padas pertaining to the worship of the 'Sagun' are known as Harjas, while those concerned with the worship of the formless are known as Sabads. The sabads are current under the names of numerous saints, but it would be wrong to assume that all such sabads have been composed by them. These sabads are a special heritage of Rajasthan and are sung in different tunes and ragas. They are frequently sung during 'Jagarana' festivals when the devotees keep awake all the night. They have spread even to the remotest villages. Their subjects are God, immortality of soul, the transience of life, non-discrimination, meaninglessness of caste and creed distinctions, the ascetic way of life, company of saints, greatness of gurus, glory of sabads, opposition to idol-worship, and so on. Some of the important composers of sabads are Machhandarnath, Gorakhnath, Bharathari, Kabirdas, Raidas, Mirabai, Sadan Kasai, Ramdevji, Roopande, Gharu Meghval, Samrath, Raghubardas, Bhaironji, Bhati, Qazi Mahmood, Likhmoji Mali, Bhomji, Bhaninath Vajind, Jaitgiri, Bhajangiri, Parandas, Devji Mali, Roopji Jat, Prannath, Hariram, Gopisar, Tirlokji, Laldas, Purandas Raidasi, Lichhman Jati, etc, many of whom came from the lower strata of society but enjoyed wide respect.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hiralal Maheshwari, Jambhoji, Vishnoi sampradaya aur sahitya, 2 volumes (Calcutta, 1971); Suryashankar Parik, Siddhha charitra (Ratangarh, 1956); Gorakhbani (Prayag, 1946); Natha siddhon ki baniyan (Varanasi, 1957); Vaichariki (Quarterly journal), Bikaner.

Hi.M.

SABAT, KUNTALA KUMARI (Oriya: b.1900, d.1938) was born in the princely state of Bastar, now in Madhya Pradesh. She spent her childhood in Burma where her father was a doctor. She had her early schooling at home where her mother taught her Oriya, Bengali and Hindi. At the age of thirteen she went to Cuttack and joined the Ravenshaw Girls' School and passed the Entrance examination in 1917. Later, she studied medicine and passed the L.M.P. examination in 1921. For about five years she served under the Red Cross Society of Cuttack, and then moved to Delhi to practice independently.

She had already made her mark as a poet of great creativity before she moved to Delhi. She now wrote poems in Hindi also and edited some periodicals too. Soon she earned a reputation as a writer in Hindi as she had already done in Oriya. She was a regular contributor to Oriya journals. Many of her poems in Oriya and her novel Raghu-Arakhita were published in Delhi.

She was far above narrow religious dogmas. A Christian by birth, she embraced Hinduism and later married an Arya Samaji. The freedom movement led by Mahatma Gandhi deeply moved her, and her nationalistic feelings found their expression in a long poem called 'Awhana' which was proscribed by the British Government immediately after it was published.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

As a lyric poet Kuntala Kumari's contribution is remarkable. Her poems, most of which are highly emotional, express her religious and patriotic feelings, besides her love of nature. Her sympathy with the downtrodden and the oppressed is revealed in her later poems, such as 'Oriyanka kandana' and 'Gadajata krushaka'. She has shown her excellence in writing odes too in Oriya. A robust sense of optimism and a desire for the uplift of humanity dominate her poems. Kuntala Kumari wrote a good few novels also which bring out her realistic and reformistic attitude. The characters she portrayed are usually social reformers with a progressive outlook, revolting against repression and superstition prevailing in contemporary society.

Her works, besides those mentioned above, include such poems as 'Anjali', 'Uchchhvasa', 'Archana', 'Sphullinga', 'Prema chintamani', and novels as Bhranti, Parasmani, Naatundi and Kali bohu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Kuntala Kumari granthavali (Cuttack, 1969); J.B. Mohanty, 'Uchhavasa kabi Kuntala Kumari', Nabajugara kabi o kavyadhara (Grantha Mandir, 1977).

J.B.M.

SABIT ALI SHAH (Sindhi; b. 1740, d. 1810) was the first Sindhi poet who wrote Marsias (Elegies) in Sindhi in memory of the martyrs. He originally belonged to Multan, but later, migrated to Sindh and settled down permanently at Sehvan.

He belonged to the Shia sect of Muslims, and called himself Jaffri, i.e. the follower of Jaffar Sadiq. He had his education under the care of several teachers.

He started his poetic career by writing 'Qassidas', the songs in praise of some noted personalities, and then turned to writing marsias and 'salams'. He wrote marsias under the influence of the well-known Punjabi poets, Mahzoon and Miskin. His first marsia in Sindhi was dedicated to Hazrat Hussain, the martyr of Karbala, which brought him praise and fame as a great marsia poet.

His compositions adhere to Persian prosody. He is considered to be the first Sindhi poet who introduced Arabic metre (Moazoon poetry or prosody) into Sindhi poetry.

Sabit Ali Shah was rather unstable in his loyalties. After the Talpurs defeated the Kalhoras, he wrote Fateh nama and Zafar nama in praise of the victories of the Talpurs. He composed satirical poems also which, however, did not raise his stature as a poet of calibre.

Sabit Ali Shah was fond of visiting the places of pilgrimage, and he went right up to Iraq in the company of his benefactor, Mir Karam Ali Khan

Among his compilations are Sindhi marsia (4 vols.), Ziarat nama and Chiring, an uncalled for satire on the contemporary poets.

Sabit Ali Shah's compositions are in many forms of poetry, viz. mussadas, masavi, fard, etc. His salams and marsias are heart-rending. His salam is written in the form of ghazal.

As a writer of marsia, salam and other forms of poetry and, as a matter of fact, for introducing Persian prosody into the Sindhi poetry, Sabit Ali Shah has earned for himself an important place in Sindhi literature.

R.P.

SABRAS (Urdu). Mulla Vajhi had the patronage of Sultan Abdullah Qutb Shah. Vajhi was a famous poet and his masnavi, Qutb-o-Mushtari (1609), narrating the adventures of a prince falling in love with an unknown princess in a dream and winning her hand after great dangers and hardships, has its own place in Urdu literature. Vajhi had narrative skill, and his narrative prose-work Sabras (1635) is an allegory, and it is his magnum opus. The allegory is a figurative treatment of one subject under the guise of another; it is, therefore, a symbolic narrative. Sabras, which has the distinction of being the first prose-work in Urdu, is an allegory of love resembling Roman de la Rose. It is an epitome of the conception of love, human and divine, written in rhyming prose and archaism characterising the age. The main characters are: 'Dil' (Heart)', 'Husn' (Beauty), 'Ishq' (Love), 'Aql' (Intellect), 'Rukhsar' (Cheek) and Lat (Ringlet)—all these are members of the human body. Sense-characters and moral-concept-characters are: 'Nazar' (Sight), 'Khayal' (Thought), 'Sabr' (Patience), 'Himmat' (Courage), 'Tauba' (Repentance), 'Naz' (Blandishment), 'Afiat' (Security, a city in the story), 'Zuhd' (Devotion, the mountain of asceticism in the story), 'Hijr' (Separation, a castle in the story), and 'Visal' (Union, the house of union in the narrative). The theme of Sabras is the natural attraction of Dil and Husn, with mystic connotations. Aql was the king of Sistan (an imaginary kingdom); his son was Dil. Convinced of his son Dil's valour and administrative abilities, the king bestowed upon him the kingdom of 'Tan' (meaning body). Dil, hearing of the life-giving properties of Ab-e-Hayat (Elixir of life), developed craving for immortality. He sent his spy Nazar to discover the source of Ab-e-Hayat. Nazar, braving hardships of all kind, reached a place named Afiyat under the king Namoos, and travelled on and on with no success.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Resuming his journey eastwards, he got to the kingdom of Ishq, whose daughter Husn, very beautiful and intelligent, was reported to be in the know of the place of Aab-e-Hayat. The narrative proceeds with many a loose end until the marriage of Dil with Husn. At long last, Dil, guided by Himmat, had the sight of Hazrat-e-Fizr, a prophet, who having discovered the elixir of life (Aab-e-Hayat), is regarded as immortal. Dil was ecstatically glad, and began to live a happy married life with the princess Husn.

Sabras, in the last analysis, seems to be an allegorical interpretation of mystical approach to God. Perhaps, because of mystic connotations, the story seems to hang loose and the quest for the 'Water of immortality' (Aab-e-Hayat) gets a little out of focus towards the end. But this may be described as 'Ama' (a dense veil of darkness in Sufi terminology) which is not unlikely before one's attaining to 'Tajalli' (Divine effulgence). Sabras, being full of terms of Sufi terminology, may be regarded as a treatise on Sufi doctrines explained in the form of a narrative. Maulvi Abdul Haq was of the opinion that the narrative Sabras was based on the story of Husn-o-dil. Aziz Ahmad is inclined to the view that Vajhi benefited from Husn-o-dil as well as Dastur-e-Ushshaq. Whatever its sources, Sabras was a watershed in the evolution of Urdu prose; its language is purely Dakhani Urdu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Anisul Haq, Sabras (in modern Urdu, 1982); Muhammad Sadiq, A History of Urdu Literature (1964); Ram Babu Saxena, A History of Urdu Literture (1940); Shamim Anhonwi (ed.), Sabras (1962); T.C. Rastogi, Islamic Mysticism: Sufism (1982).

T.R.

SABUJA (Oriya). The Sabuja literary movement in Oriya flourished between 1921 and 1935. A group of young college students, Annada Shankar Ray, Kalindicharan Panigrahi, Baikunthanath Pattanayak, Harihar Mohapatra and Sarat Chandra Mukherjee tried to enthuse the intellectual and social life of Orissa by creating a new trend in Oriya literature. They used the word 'Sabuja' or 'green' as an emblem of life. Rabindranath Tagore had used this word in his poetry as a symbol of rebellious youth, and the eminent Bengali prose stylist, Promath Chaudhury too had published a Bengali journal called Sabuj patra (1914). The young Oriya writers, inspired by the Sabuja patra, started the Sabuja Movement in Oriya literature. Poems like 'Sabuja pari'(Green fairy, 1926) by Annada Shankar Ray and 'Sabuja bandhu prati' (To a green friend, 1926) by Baikunthanath Pattnayak set the tone of this group:

> You are fresh, you are young
> Light is thy companion...
> Why do you look back then
> All is ruined, all decayed -
> Did half-dead ever create a green world? (Baikunthanatha Pattnayak)

The poets of this group evinced a certain freshness in their form, language, and technique, besides their spirit of revolt and youthful exuberance. Initially, they started a club, called 'Nonsense Club', with a handwritten magazine, named Abakasha, which was later called 'Shakti Sadhana'. They began to get acceptance in Utkal sahitya, a powerful literary journal of the day and established the Sabuja Sahitya Samiti for the promotion of contemporary Oriya literature. Sabuja kabita (Green poetry), a collection of poems by these poets, was published in 1931 which showed a clear departure from the existing Oriya poetry. It ushered into Oriya literature a new trend of beauty and music, and introduced new ways of saying things with innovative patterns of rhyme and metre. Kalindicharan in his poem 'Puri temple' and Baikunthanatha in 'Muka Bhagaban' openly expressed doubts about the age-old religious beliefs. They were the first again to introduce an international awareness in Oriya literature. But the group had no deep roots in the cultural heritage of Orissa. They relied mostly on romantic love and youthful virility, and their poems often indulged in fairy-land imagination.

These writers collectively wrote a novel, Basanti, designed after Barawari, a Bengali novel. It was serialised in Utkal sahitya, a literary journal, and later published as a book.

Under the auspices of the Sabuja Sahitya Samiti they published thirty books in different genres, e.g. Deshar daka, a drama by Harishchandra Badal; Pujarini, a poetic drama by Mayadhar Manasinha; Purnima, a poetic drama, and Patheya, a volume of poems by Sachidananda Routray; Saumya and Priyadasi, two poetic dramas; Amar chita and Mukta gadara kshudha, two novels by Kalindicharan Panigrahi; Tu mo maa, a novel by Dibyasingha Panigrahi; Sani sapta, a novel by Chintamoni Mohanti; Mukti pathe, a poetic drama by Baikunthanatha Pattnayak. The Sabuja writers also started a short-lived magazine Yugabina (1933-1935) which left a deep impact on the minds of the intelligentsia acquainting them with world literature. It laid more stress on fiction which, as a result, achieved a new momentum. Writers like Bhagabaticharan Panigrahi and Sachidananda Routray published short stories written with a new angle.

The Sabuja group flourished till the beginning of the forties with many new entrants. Subsequently, Kalindicharan Panigrahi began to change his poetic attitude and technique under the influence of the Marxist thought and progressive ideas. Annada Shankar Ray had already switched over to the Bengali language as his medium of writing. Other Sabuja writers also ceased to have their earlier dedication except Baikunthanatha and Kalindicharan. The latter shot to fame with his novel Matira manisa (1931) and stories like 'Mansara bilapa'. While the former is a saga of unforgettable brotherly love in a joint family, the latter is a monumental achievement in the description of divine bondage symbolically represented through two animals.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Sabuja Movement in Oriya literature can be compared with the Kallol Movement of Bengal, the Chhayavadi Movement of Hindi, and the Ravikiran Mandal of Marathi literature. Sabuja writers were initially romantics and escapists in their attitude with little concern for social or national issues, but as they matured in experience they came to terms with the multi-faceted reality of life in their poems, short stories and novels. They were greatly responsible for freeing Oriya literature from the shackles of orthodoxy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Kalindicharan Panigrahi (ed.), Sabuja kabita (Cuttack, 1931); Kunjabihari Dash (ed.), Adhunika Oriya sahityara bhumi o bhumika (Bhubaneshwar, 1962); Nityananda Satapathi, Sabujaru sampratika (Cuttack, 1979); Saratchandra Pradhan, Kabyadhara o kabi manas (Cuttack, 1976).

S.C.P.

SACHAL (Sindhi; b. 1739, d. 1829), real name Abdul Wahab, was son of Salah-ud-Din. He adopted 'Sachal' or 'Sachu' as his poetic name, which literally means 'Man of Truth' or 'Devotee of Truth'. He is also called 'Sarmast' because of his being in a perpetual state of trance. Out of reverence, his disciples pronounce Daraz as 'Dar-e-Raz', which means 'Gate of Divine Mystery'. Among mystic poets, his most ardent admirer and adorer was poet Bedil.

Sachal's lineage is traced to Omar Farooq, the second Caliph in succession to the Prophet. The Farooqi family was well-established in Khairpur State because of the patronage of Mir Suhrab Khan, in whose service one of the earlier elders of the family, Ahmed Farooqi, had entered and rendered a creditable account of himself. In consequence, the Mir awarded him an excellent Jagir.

Sachal was yet a child when his father died and he came under the loving care of his uncle Faqir Abdul Haq. His uncle, later, became his Murshid (spiritual guide) and also his father-in-law. Sachal's wife survived only for a couple of years, and thereafter, Sachal chose to remain single throughout his life. Sachal's grandfather, Faqir Sahibdino, was also a man of God and is said to have earned spiritual grace from Bibi Raha Basri. He had also served in the Mir's court for a short duration before he became a recluse, secluding himself in the heart of a thick and thorny bush. Shah Latif is said to have once met him and persuaded him to reveal himself to the world, so as to illumine the minds of his people.

Sachal was an Awaisi Faqir. Awaisis receive spiritual grace from departed masters, although they may also have living preceptors to kindle in them at the outset spiritual awakening. Shah was at first inspired by Yogis and Sachal by Abdul Haq. Shah then acquired celestial wings from Rumi and Sachal from Attar.

Sachal possessed mastery over Persian and Arabic, and committed the entire Quran to memory. Hence, he was called Hafiz, i.e. 'Memoriser of the Sacred Book', like the Persian poet Hafiz Shirazi. In fact, Sachal is called 'Hafiz Darazi' for reasons more than one. Like Hafiz, he knew the Quran by heart, sang of wine, love and beauty, condemned cant, bigotry and hypocrisy, castigated men of religion for their false pretensions, wrote mystical 'Diwans' and was ever immersed in Mansoorian ecstasy. Above all, he was, like Hafiz, so much attached to his native place that he did not leave it even once during his lifetime. For Sachal music was the food of soul. As Rumi was transported to ecstasy by the melody of the flute, Sachal was divinely thrilled by the harmony of tabla and sarangi.

'Religions', says Sachal, 'have confused the minds of men'. Men have no understanding of the essence of religions. Men of intellect indulge in arguments and disputations; and the ignorant wallow in superstition and ritualism. There is no dearth of charlatans, who know well enough how to inspire awe and wonder in the minds of the credulous'.

There is no doubt that Sachal's outward demeanour was that of a pious man of religion, but when the ocean of divinity surged within him, he indulged in utterances that were bound to lacerate the nerves of staunch and orthodox clergymen. He would say:

> By no means has Kalma made me a Muslim, Nor has Ahmed (Holy Prophet) transmitted faith to me from Arabia, Sachu is all Glorious Lord, though in men's eyes a human being.

Sachal is called 'Shair-e-haft zaban', i.e. 'Poet of seven languages'. He had mastery over Sindhi, Hindi, Urdu, Saraiki, Persian, Arabic and Punjabi. His poetry exists in all these languages in the form of dohas, kafis, ghazals and masnavis—Arabic words, expressions and quotations being interspersed at places by way of adornment and authoritative testimony. There is often an inter-mixture of Hindi and Urdu, Saraiki and Punjabi,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Persian and Arabic. In doha form, he has also, like Shah, sung of the glory of immortal lovers: Sasui and Punhu, Mumal and Rano, Nuri and Tamachi, Laila and Chanesar, Suhni and Mehar, of the music of Bijal and mystical abandonment of Rai Divach, of king Umar's treacherous conduct and Marui's ideal chastity and her inspiring patriotic love. In all these narrations he has expounded mystical truths of true wisdom. Besides, he has, like Shah, sung of the universal beneficence of rain, the evil vagaries of the camel (mind) and the spiritual resplendence of yogis. He has also touched the themes of the respective emissary roles of the crow and the moon. He undoubtedly owed his inspiration to Shah in these themes of local colour and character, and to Rumi in his Persian ghazals and masnavis.

K.B.A.

SACHAL SARMAST JO CHOONDA KALAAM (Sindhi) contains selections from the poetry of Sachal Sarmast, compiled and edited by Kalyan Bulchand Advani, and published by Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi, in 1966. Sachal Sarmast (b. 1739, d. 1827) was one of the trinity (Shah, Sachal, Sami) of Sufi poets of Sindh. His real name was Adul Wahab and his father's name was Salah-ud-Din. But he adopted 'Sachal' (or 'Sachu', meaning truthful) as his pen name. He was an uncompromising follower of Truth and exhorted: 'Speak out the truth, care not whomsoever it offends'. He was even more in revolt against the falsehood and silly dogmas of his time. Sachal exposed the Mullas, Akhunds and Maulvis, who were the literary and spiritual directors of man's conscience in his days, and went so far as to say: "Strike the Mulla on his pate."

It is surprising that, though Sachal himself was learned and well-versed in many languages (viz. Sindhi, Urdu, Siraiki, Persian and Arabic), he did not care to record in writing his poetry. It is evident from the fact that no mansucript of poetry written by the poet himself has come to light yet, nor has such a record, prepared during the life-time of the poet by any of his disciples, survived. According to Tanvir Abbasi, who is at present engaged in preparing a comprehensive and critical edition of Sachal's poetry in Khairpur (Mirs) Sindh, the earliest manuscript that has come to light so far is an anthology of Persian poems compiled by Sher Muhammad Faruqi. It was written in Hijri 1265 (AD 1848) and contains selected poems of Sachal Sarmast in Sindhi. There are two more manuscripts of Sachal's poetry written during the last decade of the 19th century. But, the earliest and comprehensive collection of Sachal's poetry in printed form seems to be Risalo Sachal Saina jo, edited and compiled by Mirza Ali Quli Beg, in two volumes and published in 1902 and 1903 respectively. It was followed by another huge collection of Sachal's poetry in 1922, prepared by Agha Sufi. Both these editions lack correct text and its critical analysis. However, in comparison, the edition, Risalo Sachal Sarmast: Sindhi kalam (Sindhi poetry of Sachal Sarmast, 1958), edited by Usman Ali Ansari, and Risalo Sachal Sarmast: Siraiki kalam (1959), edited by Muhammad Sadiq Ranipuri, published by Sindhi Adabi Board, Hyderabad Sindh, are more authentic and comprehensive. Besides, Sachal jo kalam (Baroda, 1952) by Nimano Faqir is a valuable compilation of Sachal's poetry. Ruki Bai, a devout Hindu lady and disciple of Sachal Sarmast, became known as 'Nimano Faqir' (A humble faqir), who devoted her entire life to propagation of her preceptor's message.

Kalyan Advani, while preparing his edition of selections from Sachal's poetry, has referred to the above-mentioned printed editions and some other collections also. He has prepared a critical text of selected poems and divided it into two parts, viz. 'Choonda bayt' (Selected verses) and 'Kafiyoon' (Selected 'Kafi' poems). In each part the poetry is classified in different sections according to the subject matter. Each section contains an introduction to the philosophical thought, content and annotations to difficult words in footnotes. Besides, the work contains a brief account of Sachal's life and the central idea of his poetry. No doubt, Kalyan Advani, in this edition, succeeds in acquainting the general reader with the philosophy and poetic beauty underlying the poetry of Sachal Sarmast. It is one of the best selections edited critically. However, the need for an authentic, critical and comprehensive edition of the entire poetry of Sachal Sarmast on the principles of modern textual criticism will remain so long as it is not ventured upon and brought out. Considering the importance of Sachal's poetry, the edition prepared by Kalyan Advani has been transliterated into Devanagari Sindhi script and published by Sahitya Akademi in 1970.

M.K.J.

SACHANANDANI, PARSRAM HIRANAND 'ZIA' (Sindhi; b. 1911, d.1958), popularly known as 'Zia', was a much respected Sindhi poet. He belonged to a well-to-do middle class family. His father, who was in cotton trade, lost his fortune, and the boy Parsram could not go for education beyond three primary classes. Afterwards he learnt Urdu, without attending any regular school, to such a degree of proficiency that he could compose verses in that language. He grew up in poverty. In his formative period, he came under the influence of Ata Muhammad 'Ata' (d.1936), and wrote under the pen-name 'Ranjur' and published a collection of his early endeavours entitled

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Gulzar-e-Ranjur (1936). Soon after, he came in contact with Sheikh Murad Ali 'Kazim' (d.1954). He studied Urdu prosody under his guidance, and on his advice, Parsram changed his pseudonym from 'Ranjur' (The afflicted) to 'Zia' (The light). This change proved to be auspicious. He was employed by His Master's Voice Gramophone Company as their lyricist in Sindhi, and became very popular throughout Sindh for his lyrics, which were based on Sindhi folklore and were couched in chaste Sindhi idiom. For his literary compositions he adopted Persianised diction, as was the trend then in literary circles. He received an Award from Sindhi Adabi Board in 1942 for his manuscript Tasvire-e-Ahsas, which was published the next year. It is a collection of poems on Persian model with traditional imagery, on subjects like nature, love, beauty, society, etc. Being a non-muslim, he wrote 'Naat' in praise of Prophet Muhammad also. Notwithstanding the unnatural Persianised diction, the poems have a charm of their own. The long poem, entitled 'Remembrance of the native land in a foreign country', is considered to be the best in the volume. The feelings lyrically expressed through it are intense and gripping.

After migration to India in 1947, he settled in Kalyan Camp (now Ulhasnagar) near Bombay. Living in uncongenial surroundings of the refugee camp, he started writing poems depicting agony and misery of the daily life of refugees in a satirical and humorous vein and published them in Sindhi dailies under the captions 'Sigratbaza ja suta' and 'Sipahia ja sukhan'. These poems remind one of the boyhood gimmick: man's face so drawn that it looks all smiles and good cheers one way, but turned upside down becomes all sad and droopy. These poems, which have the colour and flavour of the camp life, and which made Zia the poet of the masses, still remain scattered in the old issues of the newspapers. Alap Zia is a selection of his post-partition period poems published posthumously in 1958. The poems are marked for their simple and lucid style and depth of feeling and humanity. However, they betray the influence of progressive movement. Zia, a gentle, modest person, was loved by children and he wrote many poems for them also, which he could not publish in a book form. He also translated and published Jap Sahib, Sukhmani, Salok Mahla Nava (Sikh religious poems), Bhagavad Gita (in collaboration with Lekhraj Aziz) and some verses of the Rigveda.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: L.H. Ajwani, History of Sindhi Literature (1970); Suhni, Sindhi monthly—Special Ziya Number (Bombay 1959).

N.G.N.

SACHDEV, PADMA (Dogri; b. 1940) was born at Jammu and had her initial education there. Later, she worked as staff artist with All India Radio, Bombay. Padma is the first and the best-known Dogri poetess. With four collections of poems to her credit so far, she has acquired for herself a prominent place among the frontline modern Dogri poets.

Padma is a poetess of new sensibility. She pays greater attention to craftsmanship and weaves a new kind of imagery in her poems. At the same time, on the expression level, she communicates the maximum of experience through a minimum of the means. In some poems, she ventures out to investigate the status of a common man within the Duggar society as also in the world at large. Some of her poems betray her introspection which leads to her efforts to spell out things, events, situations and experiences in a detached manner with intellectual spontaneity.

The titles to her credit are: Poetry: Meri kavita mere geet (1969), which brought her the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1971, at the young age of 29, Tawi te chanhan (1976), Nheriyan galiyan (1982) and Pota pota nibal (1987). The first title has been translated into Hindi. Many of her poems have been translated into Indian languages, and a few into English and Russian. For some years now, Padma has been contributing her essays on a myriad subjects to Hindi journals, and some of these have been compiled in a book entitled Diwankhana. A few of her selected poems have been translated into Hindi and brought out under the title, Shabad milwa.

Padma Sachdev has been an active member of the Dogri Advisory Board of Sahitya Akademi and of the General Council of the Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Arts, Culture and Languages.

Ve.R.

SADANANDAN, S.L. PURAM (Malayalam; b. 1926). Born at Sethu Lakshmi Puram, Alleppey district, Sadanandan passed the Malayalam Higher examination and was later sent to jail for his political activities. He was also actively involved in the well-known Punnapra-Vayalar revolt. As a fighter for national freedom, he has been awarded the Tamra Patra.

Sadanandan's first contributions were revolutionary songs. He took to full-time writing only by 1957 when he bade farewell to active politics. Today he is an acknowledged playwright with thirty-two works to his credit, including a novel, some short story collections and a book dealing with his reminiscences as a political activist. A writer with a sense of commitment to society, he has presented varied social problems through his plays and has won several awards at the state and the national levels. Oral koodi kallanayi (One more has become a thief) won him the first prize in the playwriting competition held by the Samastha Kerala Sahitya Parishat in 1955. He received the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award for another play, Kakkapponnu (Imitation gold), and an award from the Central Ministry of Education for Ithiri mannum othiri manushyarum (A little soil and a lot of people). Agniputri (The daughter of fire) raised him to the status of the best Indian screen playwright in 1968. No less noteworthy is the gold medal awarded to him by the Central government for the screen play of the celebrated Malayalam novel Chemmeen, written by Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai. Kattukutira (The wild horse) won him an award from the State government. A number of his plays have been filmed.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

N.M.C.W

SADARANGANI, GULI (Sindhi; b. 1906), a well-known novelist, was born at Karachi. She is the sister of Krishna Kripalani, the renowned critic and writer in English and the first Sectretary of Sahitya Akademi. Guli joined the freedom movement and was an active freedom fighter amongst the women of Sindh. She courted arrest during the freedom struggle and spent several months in jail. Her husband, Ramchand Sadarangani, a prominent advocate of Karachi, also took an active part in the freedom movement and underwent imprisonment for several years.

Guli made her debut in literature by translating Rabindranath Tagore's novel Gora into Sindhi, published in 1938. But she made her mark as a writer after the publication of her novel Ittehad (Unity, 1941). The novel raised a controversy, as the author portrayed a Hindu heroine Asha, marrying a Muslim boy Hamid, which the critics thought was hardly the way to promote Hindu-Muslim unity. She came out with the statement that the last portion of the novel in which the Hindu boy, Ranjit, marries a Muslim girl, Zarina, had been pruned by the publishers, keeping in mind the disturbed communal situation prevailing in Sindh at that time, especially when the Muslims were in a huge majority and wielded tremendous political power in the province. Guli fulfilled her long cherished desire by publishing the second edition of the novel with a different title, Melapi jivan (1983).

It contains the missing part of the earlier published novel, Ittehad. The work depicts artistically the problems relating to inter-region (Vijay and Aruna) and inter-religion marriages (Hamid and Asha, Ranjit and Zarina), and tries to prove that the 'two-nation theory' put forth by M.A. Jinnah is not sound and fair. The novel is highly influenced by the philosophical thoughts of Gandhiji, Tagore and Aurobindo.

Guli's other notable works include: Novels: Sadhna jo sapno (Dream of Sadhana, 1961), Akhireen inqilab (The last revolution 1979); Translations: Jawaharlal Nehru's Letters to a Daughter and Gandhiji.

Guli Sadarangani is an ardent devotee of Sri Aurobindo and has often visited Pondicherry and stayed there for long periods. She has also had close spiritual contacts with the 'Divine Mother' of the Ashram. Guli has been a free-thinking person and a supporter of women's cause. She firmly belives in the equal status for women, and her writings, therefore, generally propagate these views.

M.K.J.

SADARANGAN, HARUMAL ISARDAS 'KHADIM' (Sindhi; b. 1913) is a prominent Sindhi poet and Persian scholar. After postgraduating in Persian from the University of Bombay in 1938, he started his career as Lecturer in Sindhi, D.G. National College, Hyderabad (Sindh). He was Head of the Department of Persian, D.J. Sindh College, Karachi, at the time of migration from Sindh in 1948. He obtained his Ph.D. degree from the University of Bombay in 1946 for his research work, The Persian Poets of Sindh. He was invited to Iran on a research scholarship by the University of Teheran during 1954-56 and obtained a D.Litt. for his dissertation in Persian, A short History of Persian Poetry in Iran, India and Sindh. After migration to India, he worked as Lecturer in Sindhi at Delhi College during 1948-54. Subsequently, he joined the External Services Division of All India Radio as Supervisor of the Persian Unit from where he retired in 1974. Sadarangani was member of Sindhi Advisory Board of Sahitya Akademi during 1957-77, and member of General Council as well as Executive Board of Sahitya Akademi during 1968-77.

Sadarangani came under the influence of Lekhraj Aziz (1897-1971), a prominent Sindhi poet, and acquired technical excellence in the art of poetry. His poems were prescribed for the Matriculation course of the University of Bombay in 1935, when he himself was a student of B.A. of that University. His first collection of poems Rangin Rubaiyun (Variegated quatrains, 1959), containing 194 quatrains on Persian model, is an enjoyable reading for closely-knit ideas. Its 108 quatrains, along with their Hindi translation in verse, were published by Bharatiya Jnanpith. Chikha (A shriek, 1977), a collection of free verse, was picked up for Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1978. Priha ji bakha (The first glimmer of dawn, 1972), another collection of his poems, mostly free verse, was given University Grants Commission Award in 1981. Both the books are an expression of his personal feelings and experience of day-to-day life. The poems describe the beauty of nature, and portray exquisite emotions. In his poems one finds occasional humour and criticism of social evils. However, his poetry brings out an authenticity of experience and sincerity of feeling, and the language used is simple with a mastery over the poetic technique. Within the bounds of free verse, there is an attempt at bringing in modern sensibility. His latest book, Khushbu jo safar (The flow of fragrance, 1980), is a collection of 457 quatrains (Rubais), new and old, depicting various modes and eternal human experiences with sincere and deep feeling. The punch lines of these quatrains bear testimony to his excellent craftsmanship. The latest book brought out by the author is a comparative study of Shah Abdul Latif, the premier poet of Sindh, entitled Kanwar parun patar mein (The lotus has its roots deep, 1984). On this scholarly work, Abichandani comments, 'The element of objectivity in Sadarangani has taught him the art of standing apart. This book is the result of diligent research. Its approach is scholarly and very didactic, but the heavy severity of his style is relieved by illustrations from other Sindhi and Punjabi poets for comparison with those of Shah Abdul Latif, whose life style and poetry he has so painstakingly analysed.'

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Sadarangani's other works in Sindhi include: Poetry: Ruha d'ino relo (Outpourings of the soul, 1963). Essays: Kakha ain kana (Straws and stalks, 1966). Translations: Babarnamo (1964) from Persian, Guru Gobind Singh (1966), Umrao Jan Ada (1978) from Urdu and Vallattol (1980) from English. Works in English: The Persian Poets of Sindh (1956), published by Sindhi Adabi Board, Karachi. Persian: Parsi Guyane Hind Va Sindh (1977), published by Bonyade Ferhange Iran, Teheran.

N.G.N.

SADASHIVA, G.S. (Kannada; b. 1941) is a short-story writer. An M.A. of Mysore University, presently he is Assistant Editor, Prajavani, Bangalore.

Sadashiva has written three collections of stories — Maguvagi bandavanu, Thunakugalu and Nam kauli kandra. He belongs to the Navya school. Interested in the complexity of human relations, Sadashiva probes these relations through monologues, the barriers between mind and mind. A Kafkesque situation is presented in Sikku, and the plight of man trapped in a situation he can neither understand nor change, and his bewilderment in a maze of human relations are brilliantly probed. The story has been presented on the television.

L.S.S.R.

SADASHIVA, K. (Kannada; b. 1934, d. 1977), one of the pioneers of the modernist or Navya short story in Kannada, was born in the rural Malnad region. Graduating from Mysore University with a Master's degree in Zoology, he held the post of Reader in JSS College, Mysore, till his death. He published two collections of short stories, Naliyalli neeru banthu (Water gushed out of the tap, 1957) and Aparichitaru (Strangers, 1971). The title story of the first collection brought him instant fame and has been translated into several other languages; it has also been filmed. The second collection secured the State Sahitya Academy Award (1972).

Sadasiva excelled in portraying domestic and neighbourly conflicts and man-woman relationships both in and out of marriage in rural as well as urban middle class life. His short stories are intensly human and touch the heart with poignant tenderness. The apparent simplicity of the narration enhances even as it strictly controls the essentially dramatic nature of the situations he depicts. He is also adept in the use of the simplest as well as the most complex symbols. Some of his outstanding short stories are 'Naliyalli neeru banthu', 'Ramana savari santhege hodaddu', 'Giddi', 'Aparichitaru' and 'Havu'.

K.N.M.

SADASHIVA RAO, PEJVARA (Kannada; b.1913, d.1939) was a Kannada poet, playwright and writer of short stories. He was born in Pejvara in South Kannada district, Karnataka. He had his early education at Mangalore and later took a B.E. from Banaras Hindu University. He subsequently went to Milan (Italy) for research in Mobile Engineering, and died there.

Sadashiva Rao's Varuna, cotaining 48 poems, was a posthumous publication (1952). Life and death, Nature and his country were his themes. He also reflected the conflict between the Indian and the western cultures. He also wrote three plays, Sarapani, Bedigilida nari and Jivana shilpa, and two short stories. In his attitude and diction, he sometimes anticipated Navya poetry.

L.S.S.R.

SADASIVA PANDARATHAR (Tamil; b. 1892, d.1960) was trained under great scholars like Pinnathur

Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Narayanaswami Iyer and V. Balasubramanya Pillai Sadasivam who motivated him into pursuing research on inscriptions. He worked as Head Tamil Pandit in the Banadurai High School, Kumbakonam, for nearly twenty-five years. He began contributing articles to Senthamil, a literary monthly of the Madurai Tamil Sangam, and Tamizh pozhil of the Karanthai Tamil Sangam.

He first deciphered the inscriptions in the ancient temple at Tiruparampayam itself. Starting from there, he went on many missions to places in and around Kumbakonam, collecting inscriptions from the temples, analysing and publishing them. The renowned epigraphist Gopinatha Rao was his guide. He shot into prominence by his paper on 'Kalladam and its Age'. Articles on Karikalan, Cholan Chenkanan, Adhikaman Neduman Anji, Kalladam, Tiruvaikavoor Inscriptions, Kandar Adithan I, Karunakara Thondaiman (1923), Kulothunga Chola I (1930), Pandiyar Varalu (1940), began to appear in succeeding years.

In 1943, Pandarathar joined the Annamalai University under Pandithamani Kathiresan Chettiar and continued till 1960. There, he wrote his masterly thesis 'The Later Cholas' (1949-51) and A Short History of the Dark Age of Tamil Literature from AD 300-600 (1955), and published the history of Tamil literature relating to 13th, 14th and 15th centuries.

The Madurai Tiruvalluvar Kazhagam conferred the title 'Research Scholar' on Pandarathar. In 1956, he was given a gold pendant and 'ponnadai' (brocade); he also received an award from the Madras Tamil Writers' Association. He was on the Board of Editors of the Tamil Encyclopaedia (1959). His contribution to the field of inscriptional research was immense.

S.Sr.

SADASUKHLAL, MUNSHI (Hindi; b. 1746, d. 1824), a Hindi prose writer of some historical importance, was born in Delhi. He was equally well versed in Urdu and Persian in which languages too he made some metrical compositions. He was in the service of the East India Company and spent most of his time at Chunar and Allahabad. He served the Company as Tahsildar, resigned at the age of sixty-five, and spent the rest of his life in the service of the Lord.

Sadasukhlal is one of the four pioneers of modern Hindi prose, the other stalwarts being Insha Allah Khan, Lalluji Lal and Sadal Misra. While Lalluji Lal and Sadal Mirsa wrote at the behest of their employers, the East India Company and Fort William College, Munshi, like Insha Allah Khan, was an independent writer writing for the love of it. This is the hallmark of his literary taste. He followed the prose tradition initiated by Ram Prasad Niranjani and Daulat Ram, and used Sanskrit words liberally. This form of Khari boli in which Sadasukhlal wrote was the language of the educated middle-class society of the eastern Hindi region. It was known as 'Bhakha' which he favoured, instead of cultivating the Persian-mixed Urdu patronised by the British. The deplorable neglect of Bhakha made Munshi remark, 'Rasmo rivaz bhakha ka duniyan se utha gaya' (People have abandoned the Bhakha). Although Munshi's prose style did not set a pattern for the posterity, he did a yeoman's service to the cause of Hindi at the initial stage of its development. His works include Sukh sagar (excerpts from Vishnupuran), Mantakhbuttavarikh (autobiography), and Hindi bhasha sar.

Sur. G.
S.D.M.

SADD (Punjabi) is a genre of Punjabi folk-poetry. The term 'Sadd' literally means 'a call' and is derived from the Sanskrit term 'Shabda'. Accordingly, it refers to a particular variety of Punjabi folk-songs in which a passionate and endearing call is addressed to the internal addressee of the poem, usually a parted lover. The lyrical expression of such intense emotional situations has given rise to a certain style of singing also. Apart from the folk poets, the genre of sadd has been successfully exploited by some of the medieval and modern Punjabi poets.

The thematic and stylistic features of sadd can be summarised as follows: (a) It usually expresses the intense suffering of the parted lover; (b) Intense emotional situation expressed in it virtually turns into a cry of anguish; (c) Stylistically, the internal addressee of the poem assumes the central position in its poetic structure; (d) A certain variation of the above theme is discernible in the sadds of medieval and modern poets. A disctinctive style of singing has, however, come to characterise it; (e) It uses lyrical as well as narrative modes of expression.

This mode of poetic expression is as old as the folk-poetry of Punjab. Consequently, its origin and development cannot be assigned to a particular date. The anthologies of Punjabi folk-songs are full of short lyrics, which can be properly considered sadds. These lyrical compositions are traditionally sung in their unique style even by the Punjabi folk-singers today. The parted lover in these sadds is often symbolized by any of the medieval romantic heros of 'Qissas', viz. Punnu, Mirza, Ranjha, etc. The following famous lines of a very popular sadd represent the genre:

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Hai ve Punnu zalima!
Dilan dia mehrima
Sutti nu chhor ke na jana i oey

(Punnu! O cruel one,
O sharer of the heart's secrets
Do not go away, leaving me asleep)

The next important stage in the development of this genre is evidenced in the Qissa of Mirza Sahiban written by Pilu. The dominant mode of this Qissa is the narrative, but the poet uses the structural principles of sadd to heighten the tragic effect of the story. Moreover, this Qissa is sung by folk-singers in the style proper to sadd. Here the genre of sadd undergoes a very significant expansion. What was originally a structural property of short lyrics (folk-songs), expands into the narrative world of the Qissa poetry giving a new dimension to its thematic and stylistic features. Many other less known Qissa poets also followed this principle.

Sundar, a contemporary of Pilu, also composed sadd which is included in the Adi Granth, Raga Ramkali. Here the poet tries to expand the thematic situation of the genre by introducing spiritual values of Gurubani, while retaining its essential structural features.

In the modern times, this genre has been fruitfully exploited by Punjabi poets. Aj akhan Waris Shah nu, a short poem by Amrita Pritam, can be considered an apt instance of this genre, expressing the poet's anguish at the tragic events of 1947. Here also a new type of thematic variation is clearly evidenced. The poet gives a passionate call not to the lover, but to the writer of the love narrative Qissa Heer (Waris Shah).

Some of the recent poems, written by Punjabi poets in Pakistan, also experiment with the structural principles of sadd. They have tried to combine the genre of sadd with that of the ghazal. This intertwining of the two genres creates a new situation in literary expression. In fact, the sadd is not an appropriate form for modern poetry, as it does not respond to the demands of expression of the modern sensibility.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bhai Khan Singh, Gurshabd ratnakar mahan kosh, Punjabi sahit kosh, Part I (1971); Sohinder Singh Bedi, Lokdhara vishav kosh, Vol II (1978).

Jagb.S.

SADHABAR EKADASI (Bengali) is a complete dramatic farce by Dinabandhu Mitra, first published in 1866. A subsequent edition appeared in 1870; no copy of the text first published is extant.

In this farcial drama Dinabandhu, like his predecessor Madhusudan Dutt, neatly delineated the arrogance and perversity of the 'Young Bengal' group which is representative of his literary genius.

The excellence of Sadhabar ekadasi lies not in its plot. There is a dearth of events and change in surroundings, though that does not make the play monotonous, as its eventlessness has helped the crystallisation of humour in it. The scenes are full of refreshing naturalness and the entire farce has been made lively by its excellence in the dialogue. A scrutiny of the dialogue will also reveal the social stamp of the period and, as a result, the characters have become extremely graphic, lively and realistic. The central figure is Nimchand Dutta and it is no exaggeration to say that he is almost everything in the play, as one finds the simultaneous presence in all his scenes of a resurgent Bengali intellectual and a moral deprave. The reader/spectator deeply realises Nimichand's pangs of frustration which his drunkenness and debauchery have not redeemed. The redeeming feature, however, is not altogether lost. The hypocrisy of Atal and Kanaram, the Deputy Magistrate, is intolerable to him, and he does not hesitate to expose the stupidity and self-conceit of the Deputy:

Nimichand: I wish I could build a hut close to the monument in Gader Math where I could confine the Deputy Babu and bring the news through the print to the effect that from the mofussil a queer animal with a 'pagari' (headgear) has arrived. People could have a view of him with an entry fee at the rate of rupee one per head for the older, eight annas for the younger, women without fee.

Atal: Why should women-folk be allowed free of charge?

Nimichand: Will they consider it worthwhile to see this wretched creature with a fee.

Bankimchandra had objected to its publication on the ground of obscenity, but the author paid no heed to it. Even now one may find fault with it for the same reason, yet Dinabandhu has received unstinted praise from serious readers for the literary excellence of the play.

U.B.

SADHANA (Assamese), a social novel by Dandinath Kalita, was first published in 1928 and adjudged the best novel for the Asam Sahitya Sabha Award. From the historical point of view the novel is important inasmuch as it ushered in a new era in the history of Assamese fiction by taking up the theme of social reconstruction. Not that social novels were not written earlier; at least half a dozen novels based on social themes were published before Sadhana. They, however, lacked depth in character-delineation and analysis of social problems. Sadhana marked a step forward in the art of fiction-writing on social problems.

Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The story deals mainly with two characters and their confrontation in a small town with hypocritical and self-seeking persons who malign and bring all sorts of fabricated accusations against the two principal characters anxious to bring about a social change by resorting to Gandhian methods of social reconstruction. The two main characters are Dinabandhu, an educated young man of idealistic temperament, and Prabha, an educated beauty who has high regard for the former for his ideals and values of life. The reactionary elements in society, formidable on account of their political leverage and social status, try to thwart the attempts of Dinabandhu and his fair companion to bring about a change in society. Prahba, the centre of attraction for the self-seeking group, serves as a teacher at a girl's school, newly established by Dinabandhu with a view to educating the girls of the town steeped in ignorance and superstition. The clique tries to lure away Prabha so that she could be used to fulfil their sensual desire. Having failed to do so they vilify her and spread malicious stories about her relationship with Dinabandhu, but the two of them weather the storm and succeed in restoring their image in the eyes of the people. The scheme for reconstructing society on the basis of Gandhian ideals is vigorously pursued, and they enlist another social worker, Usha, to help them in their endeavour.

Besides showing the conflict with reactionary forces, the novelist has depicted the gradual development of love between Dinabandhu and Prabha which, however, takes a different turn with the arrival of Usha on the scene. Fascinated by Dinabandhu's idealism, strength of character and capacity for hard work, Prabha was drawn towards the young man, and her love deepened with the march of time. Now Usha too feels attracted towards Dinabandhu, though the latter does not betray any sign of reciprocality. Thus a love triangle is formed with two maidens seeking one man's love. The complication is ultimately resolved by the withdrawal of Prabha who decides to lead the life of a spinster, dedicating the whole of herself to the cause of social work.

The novelist has also drawn the picture of a fallen woman in the person of Rambha, who maintains illicit relations with several men, even though she is already married. Ultimately, she ends up in the red-light area of Calcutta.

Although the novel broke a new ground in handling social problems and domestic relations, it is not wholly free from constructional defects or from the writer's personal prejudices. The reformist zeal of the novelist frequenlty interferes with the progress of the plot, and some of the characters appear as stereotypes. There are also a few sensational incidents which erode the realistic tone of the work. In spite of these shortcomings, however, the novel is noteworthy for unmasking the smugness and hypocrisy of the so-called pillars of society and for ushering in the social novel in Assamese literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dandinath Kalita, Sadhana (Tezpur, 1928); Birendra Kumar Barua, Modern Assamese literature (Gauhati, 1957); Hem Barua, Assamese Literature (New Delhi, 1965).

S.S.

SADHANA (English) is a philosophical treatise written by Rabindranath Tagore and published in the year 1913. The author's collection of essays is his first significant prose work in English that affirms a harmonious view of existence and sane living. The poet's experience is the total collective experience of Indian life, reinforced by the experience of the rishis and great saints like Buddha. The outpouring of the human soul, Tagore feels, is more profound than the reasoned account of metaphysics.

The book was written during a period of acute conflict and its resolution in the life of the author. Tagore's struggle is against the conservatism of Brahamins and the oppressive British rule. The artist seeks for spontaneous joy in the realization of love, beauty and the infinite. Participation in the rhythm of life makes for the creative unity of life and art.

Tagore deals with the relationship between the individual and the universe in his first essay. The western civilization has pitted man against the rest of creation; man feels himself superior to the universe and exploits it for his needs. He and the universe he lives in are aliens. The poet, however, discerns a close relationship in India between man and nature, between life and creation. This sense of kinship he discovers even in the wide open spaces of the universe.

The second essay explores the meaning of soul-consciousness. Man must liberate himself from the thraldom of desire—the prison of self. The creator and his creation are not inseparable. The poet is harking back to the Upanishadas and says: 'My world will light up a hundred different lamps with thy flame and place them before the altar of thy temple.' Tagore believes that in order to live a life of good, it is imperative to perceive the wholeness.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The last two essays are an elaboration of his views expressed earlier. It is only the separate self that leads to attachment. Detachment lies in merging the self in the universal self. The sense of oneness is to be found not in freedom from action, but in freedom in action. The path of realization opens up in love, truth and beauty. Tagore the humanist affirms that the great souls are those who reveal the true meaning of the Self by giving up the self for the love of man. In the process, they face calumny and persecution, deprivation and death.

The meditative Hindu and the modern European seek a broader meaning of life in historical and cultural contexts. The western civilization has disillusioned them by its ceaseless pursuit of self-gratification. The true meaning of self can be realised only through a striving for union with others and with God, which is the true yoga. Love is participation in the life of goodness, truth and beauty, which is infinite.

B.R.N.

SADHU, ARUN (Marathi; b. 1942) is a freelance writer and journalist. After taking his B.Sc. from the University of Nagpur, he was trained as a journalist. He had a stint with Marathi journalism, and then switched over to English journalism, joining Indian Express, specialising in extremely balanced political feature-writing free from any ideological bias. He also worked as a special correspondent to The Statesman for a few years and then became Editor of The Free Press Journal (1988-89).

Sadhu started writing in the early 70s. From his early works such as Mumbai dinank (1972), Sinhasan (1977) and Ani Dragon jaga zala, he moved to more matured and introspective stage in Bahishkrit (1978). His innovative novel Mumbai dinank (1972) had already showed promise of vigorous fictional energy. A commentary on the metropolitan plurality of culture, the novel offers a kaleidoscopic view in varying shades from deeply personal and reflective to the perceptively social, political and satirical, confronting the reader with changing realities and social values. Sinhasan, on which a feature film was made with the same title, found Sadhu wandering in the twilight region between the serious and the popular. His treatment of current topics, especially the game of power, is marked by the candour and frankess. His next novel, Bahishkrit, shows an identity crisis for a newly educated youth hailing from a low caste. The ideological trauma that he faces on the professional front is as tortuous to him as the emotional humiliation he has to suffer in this personal relationship owing to caste discrimination. The novel is a sad tale of a battle lost. Shapit, another novel written in the same spirit, brings out with devastating effect the predicament of the some other depressed classes. His two other novels Sphot (1978) and Trishanku show him in an altogether different light as a sensitive writer of science fiction.

His first collection of short stories Binpavasacha divas (1983) was followed by Mukti (1986). Sadhu's short stories delve deep into human psyche, penetrating layers of consciousness, addressing to the chemistry of human relationships. He tries to identify the seeds of conflict in the basic instincts of human nature. His pictorial style gives his short stories the quality of a portrait complete in itself showing his craftsmanship in a new medium he has chosen to explore.

Sadhu's only play Padgham (1986) was an innovative experiment in dramatisation of youth movement. The novelty of his treatment in a way isolated him from the popular stage trends of Marathi theatre. The play has no regular plot, nor is it a story of any particular individual or class. It presents the conflict between the power of establishment and the challenges encountered by the younger generation demanding a change. It also shows how the establishment tries to resist the change through means fair or foul, leading inevitabiealy to confrontation. The play ends on an optimistic note indicating that such confrontations may not get the desired success but they never go altogether waste either. In fact, through such defeats only the indomitable sparks of struggle illumine the future.

Shodhayatra (1989) is an anguished quest for identity marked by a close questioning of the purpose of existence. The central character is an intellectual who has had the best of both the worlds, material and spiritual, asking himself "what next?" Forceful psychological overtones, the inexorable process of socio-dynamics and the hope of finding suitable solutions for the many ills that have beset social and individual existence make the novel interesting.

A.De.

SADHU SINGH 'HAMDARD' (Punjabi; b. 1918) is a poet, journalist, novelist and critic. He was born at village Paddi Mottwali in Jalandhar district. He did his M.A., LL.B. and Ph.D. from Punjab University. He took active part in the Akali National Movement and entered the field of journalism with his appointment as Sub-editor of Vihar Sudhar, Khalsa and Khalsa, Advocate (Weekly) and the daily Ajit. After Independence, he took over charge of the editor of the daily Ajit, published from Jalandhar. In recognition of his services as a journalist, he was honoured with Shiromani Patrakar Award by the Punjab Government in 1967. He has been President of the Kendri Punjabi Lekhak Sabha, and Member of the Advisory Board of the Department of Languages, Punjab Govt. and Executive Board of Sahitya Akademi.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Sadhu Singh Hamdard is a prolific writer and some of his significant works include: Poetry: Ghazal (1963) (which received Punjab Government Award and Dr. Tarlok Singh Trust Award), Ghazal de rang (1974), Rang sugandh, Modern ghazal, Vas suwas, Cocktail; Novels: Ankh (1976), Zeenat Bhagel Singh, Takkar, Make-up, Gandharv vioh; Short stories: Bharat machda raha, Kinna badal gaya insan; Essays: Taqsim Punjab; Traveloge: Akin ditha Roos (1971); Criticism: Kav nirnay (1975).

Ph.M.

SADHU, SHYAMLAL (Kashmiri; b. 1917), a Kashmiri writer, was born in Kashmir and had his schooling there. He did his M.A. from the University of Delhi in 1938. He was formerly Principal of Government College, Baramulla; as Professor, he had also taught English there. After retirement from Government College in 1972, he joined as Principal, V.B. Women's College, Srinagar.

Sadhu's first work was in English, entitled Folk Tales from Kashmir (1963), which brought him the State Cultural Academy Award in 1965. The work is a collection of Kashmiri folk-tales translated into English. Sadhu's first Kashmiri book, Vutsha Prang (The magic carpet, 1966), is a children's book which deals with scientific discoveries and evolution of man. The book received an award from the Ministry of Cultural Affairs in 1966. Birbal (1965), the only creative work of the author is a play not exactly suitable for performance either on the stage or on Radio. Sadhu is rather known for his translations that include Don Quixote, the world famous classic by Cervantes, Qassas (1971), translation of world famous short stories, Vethi Hind Malar (1968), translation of tales relating to the historical events recorded by Kalhan (11th c.) in Chronicle of Kashmir or Rajatarangini, and other historical events recorded by Hassan Khoihami (1833-1898). At the instance of the State Cultural Academy, Sadhu translated the world famous short stories, which were collected in a book entitled Shahkar (The masterpieces), published by the Cultural Academy in 1976. Among other stories, it includes Kabuliwallah (Tagore), 'God sees the Truth' (Tolstoy), 'Diamond Necklace' (Maupassant) and 'Usne kaha tha' (Chandradhar Sharma Guleri).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.K. Rehbar, Koshur nasr (1967); J.L. Kaul, Studies in Kashmiri (1968).

Ba.A.

SADHUKATHA (Assamese). All Assamese folk-tales, whether humorous or moral, or full of wonder, are known as Sadhukatha, the prefix 'sadhu' implying that at one time the sadhus or traders used to carry news as well as tales from place to place.

The Assamese Sadhukatha is a part of the Assamese folk-literature. The collected experience of people down the centuries is embodied in this literature. It imparts a view of life of the earlier historical times. The agricultural man passed through various experiences and built up a body of comments in the form of statements based upon these experiences. He was also aware of every object necessary in his world, however agricultural or primitive it may be; and the sorrows and laughters, love and marriages, customs and rituals which occupied his world were reflected in folk-literature. It also reflected, in general, folk-belief and folk-tradition. This literature provides a type of 'burumji' for its social life, showing society's blind faith, sayings, customs, religious preoccupations, and its world of imagination and thinking. Such constituents of folk-literature are also present in Sadhukatha. Behind the epithet 'sadhu' is the implication of the good, the saintly, and what befits a sage, what is moral and what is right to follow.

In the earlier times the old folks used to refer to Sadhukatha as Saudakatha. In Sanskrit the word 'sadhu' also means a merchant or businessman, and the word 'sauda' was more commonly used than 'vanik' for a businessman. Sometimes the merchant, after long wanderings, used to return home with varied experiences and numerous tales he had collected in different countries, and he would narrate them to a willing audience. In course of time the 'Saudakatha' came to be known as 'Sadhukatha'. In the Assamese language Sadhukatha has for its characters birds and beasts, such as jackal (which is quite common), hawk, monkey and tiger. The combat of cunning between the jackal and the monkey is frequently narrated with a moral at the end. The jackal appears as cleverness personified and the tiger, despite its fearsomeness, is always an idiot. Some kathas deal with the supernatural, while others treat various natural objects as personified characters.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. Barooah, Folk-tales of Assam (Howrah, 1915); Lakshminath Bezbaroa (tr.), Tales of a Grandfather from Assam (Bangalore, 1955); Praphulladatta Goswami, Ballads and Tales of Assam (Guahati, 1970) and Tales of Assam (Gauhati, 1980).

Sh.Ba.
Pr.G.

SAFI SYED ALI LAKHNAWI (Urdu; b. 1862, d. 1950) was born and brought up at Lucknow. He had early education in Arabic and Persian, and later learnt English

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In 1895, he established a literary society called 'Dairae Adabia' (Literary circle), where subjects were announced and poems on those subjects recited. This was a radical change in the old practice of composing the traditional ornate lyrics (ghazal).

It is said that he wrote about one lakh verses, and a collection of his poems, entitled Diwan-e-Safi, was posthumously published. He has written long poems on the life of a number of leaders.

Safi is known for his poetry on the subjects of national and social reform. He also translated into Urdu poetry about 1200 Rubias (Quatrains) of Omar Khayyam. His other works include Lakhte jigar and Sahifatul Qaum which contain his poems on national and social reform.

R.G.

SAFIR BILGRAMI (Urdu; b. 1833, d. 1889), Sayyid Farzand Ahmad Safir Bilgrami, disciple of the great poet, Ghalib, and author of the famous 'Tazkirah', Jalwa-e-Khizr, was born at Marehra (U.P) in the house of his maternal grandparents. His father's name was Mir Sayyid Ahmad. At the age of two Safir was shifted with his mother to Bilgram (U.P.), where he lived for about two years. He then went to Arrah (Bihar) and settled there permanently. Thus, though Safir was neither born at Bilgram nor did he pass his life there, he had great respect for the homeland of his forefathers. He regarded Bilgram as his home and identified himself with it, as the past-position of his pen-name, Bilgrami (of Bilgram) suggests.

Starting his formal education in a 'maktab' at the age of seven, he got proficient in the Urdu and Persian languages. As a child, he had a wonderful memory, and he cultivated the habit of collecting books at the tender age of eight. He is said to have started writing prose when he was hardly nine years old. He diverted his talents towards poetry at the age of 14, and for the next two years or so would compose mostly Persian poetry, the outcome being a Persian masnavi and a collection of Persian ghazals. In his sixteenth year, he turned to Urdu Poetry. Safir was the last and final of the several pseudonyms he adopted. The young poet approached several master poets for guidance, the most prominent being Dabir Lakhnavi and Ghalib. With them Safir had close relations. Eventually, he got his poetic compositions corrected by Ghalib through correspondence.

Safir Bilgrami lived in Patna (Bihar) for about eighteen years, where he gradually developed a fairly large circle of disciples and followers, and earned name and fame. Nevertheless, he preferred Arrah to be his permanent abode and eventually died there, leaving behind an enormous line of disciples and a long list of books.

Safir was a prolific and versatile author. He was a poet, a critic, a researcher and a historian. As a poet, he tried his hand at all the prevalent forms of Urdu poetry, viz. ghazal, qasida, marsia and masnavi. During his not-so-long life span of about 56 years, he wrote many books. His disciples give him credit of writing as many as 697 works. Notwithstanding this unbelievable number, it is a fact that Safir was the most productive of his contemporaries. His most-known works include: Poetry: Safir-e-Bulbul and Khum Khana-i-Safir; Prose: Jalwa-e-Khizr (Vols. I and II), Tarikh-e-Bilgram (Part I), Rashhat-e-Safir, Mahsharistan-e-khayal.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Mushfiq Khwaja; Ghalib aur Safir Bilgrami (Karachi, 1981). Zafar Uganvi, Safir Bilgrami—Hayat aur karname (Calcutta, 1976).

M.H.K.

SAFIR, PRITAM SINGH (Punjabi; b. 1916). Born at Malikpur in Rawalpindi district, now in Pakistan, Safir's father, Sarder Mehtab Singh, who served as headmaster of Shri Guru Arjan Dev Khalsa High School, Tarn Taran, was one of the leading Sikh political activists. After graduation from Khalsa College, Amritsar, Safir qualified for Law from the Law College, Lahore. He started practice at the Bar at Lahore in 1938. He moved to Delhi Bar as a consequence of the Partition, where he came to be elevated as Judge of the High Court, Delhi, in 1969.

Rooted in the soil and classical sensibility, and yet remaining abreast with the modern perceptions of the avantgardists, Pritam Singh Safir is a unique phenomenon of the forties, the decade known for the proliferation of Punjabi letters. Author of as many as ten collections of poems, he ranks among the most pervasive poets in the language in recent times.

His first publication brought out in 1939 was a collection of one-act plays entitled Panj natak. It was followed by a series of poetry books: Kattak kunjan (1941), Pap de sohle (1942), Rakt bundan (1949), Raag Rishmani (1946), Aad jugad (1955), Sarab kala (1966), Guru Gobind (1966), Anik bistar (1981), Agam agochar (1981), Sanjog vijog (1982), and then an omnibus volume containing all his works, entitled Sarab nirantar (1987). The only prose work he has authored in Punjabi is Dhur ki bani (1975). Ten Holy Masters and Their Commandments (1980), The Tenth Master (1983) and A study of Bhai Veer Singh's Poetry (1985) are his three prose works in English

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Literary recognition came to him in the shape of various awards including Shiromani Sahitkar Award of the Punjab Government in 1966, Sahitya Akademi Award in 1983 (on Anik bistar), Sahitya Vicharmanch Award in 1987 and K.S. Dhaliwal Award in 1988.

Safir entered the realm of Punjabi letters with a distinctive character in his verse that he has maintained all these years. Stalwarts like Bhai Veer Singh, Mohan Singh and Dhani Ram 'Chatrik', with whom he rubbed shoulders, failed to influence his style and approach. An island in himself, it has also not been possible for anyone coming after him to emulate him. Though he liberated himself from the rigidities of traditional forms, including those conforming to metre and rhyme, he continues to avail himself of the musicality of rhyme in a highly subtle and skilfully fabricated patterns. Having drunk deep at the fount of thought and idiom of the Sikh scriptures, Safeer's verse has metaphysical overtones and scriptural idiom. Time and gain he gives the impression as if words fail to keep pace with the torrential outburst of his emotions. Temperamentally highly impetuous, at times his imagery has a riot of colours.

A great admirer of Guru Gobind Singh, the tenth Sikh Guru, he hightlights higher values of truthful living and impeccable conduct of life. There is an unmistakable strain of mysticism in his poetry, though he tries as best as he can to retain his feet on the earth and take care of the social reality. No deviation from the determined path, no flirtation with the new models of the 'new' writer, and yet he remains 'new'. The familiar-unfamiliarity of his thought, his preference for sophistication of expression loaded with personal idiom resulting in turgid flow of verse, makes his reader pause and reflect what the poet is trying to communicate.

With the spiritual strand in his temperament and his pre-occupation with metaphysics, he often seems to take a cynical view of worldly love.

Indian mystics believe that it is 'ishq majazi', worldly love, that in due course converts itself to 'ishq haqiqi', spiritual love. Safir seems to follow this dictum, but the craftsman in him is so skilful that his reader hardly ever perceives when he slips from one into the other.

Safir is an artist who arrests with the passion of a mystic the moments of self-confrontation against shadows of the physical love of a common mortal. This is an awareness of a mission in Safir's poetry, an urge for a higher meaning, the quality of soul.

K.S.D.

SAGAR DEKHICHA

SAGAR DEKHICHA (Assamese) is an important volume of poems by Devakanta Barooah, representing the last phase of romanticism in Assamese literature. It also reflects a modern, analytical attitude towards life. Though the anthology was first published in the year 1948, the poems were actually written during or before the Second World War. Many of the poems show the influence of Browning and Eliot on both the style and the sensibility of the poet.

The central theme in Sagar dekhicha is love. Though Devakanta Barooah is basically a romantic poet, he has an analytical mind which can examine the romantic ideal of love. This outlook was something new in Assamese romantic literature; for example, one can point out 'Devdasi', one of the poems in Sagar dekhicha. In this poem the tradition of devdasis attached to temples, sacrificing their life by offering their love to a god, has been questioned. The poet asks if there is any justification to uphold the practice. Does a god accept such love? Is there not enough of it in heaven offered by the celestial nymphs? The offering of love to one who is already surfeited with it has been compared to the offering of a meagre meal by a poor person to a rich man. An element of social consciousness is thus reflected in the poem. The poet questions the established values of religion and society, and descends from the ethereal love of the romantics to the earthy world of mortals with human failings and foibles.

In his poems 'Kalang parat majnisa', 'Asarthak' and 'Aprakas' addressed to his beloved, the poet comes to terms with reality even in his yearnings for his loved one. He also brings out the fear of the unknown and darkness, and confirms that death is the limit to our strivings. The awareness of death in the living world is the result of the onslaught of harsh urban industrial development on our life. In the thirties, industrialisation had not taken a big stride in Assam, but it made an impression on the poet's mind and his writings. Devakanta has also portrayed man's courage, strength and conviction in spite of fate's machinations and death's ultimate limiting factor.

Apart from the romantic tone in Sagar dekhicha we find in it the poet's belief in man's simple life in such poems as 'Pragati', 'Prithvi' and 'Rahasya'. This tone is sometimes again mixed with a satirical view of the social preoccupations. 'Lachit Barphukan' is an apt example in which the poet ridicules the degradation of Assam and stresses the high ideals of Barphukan.

In the third edition of Sagar dekhicha four more poems were included. These poems belonged to the fifties and the middle of the sixties. 'Mor desh manuhar desh' is one of the poems where we hear the tone of national integration and a call to unite and stand against the enemy of India. The poem was written in the wake of the Chinese aggression against India. 'Ami duar mukali karo', a poem written later, expresses fear and false progressivism. 'Eti prathana', another poem, reflects the uncertainty of the modern mind which has lost faith in both self and love.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The most noteworthy aspects of Sagar dekhicha are its dramatic expressions, the spontaneity of rhythm and the rich flow of language. The poems in Sagar dekhicha reflect the romanticism of the thirties, the sense of insecurity of the forties, and the disillusionment and consequent helplessness of the fifties and sixties.

Nir.B.

'SAGAR', JAGANNATH DAMODARDAS TRIPATHI (Gujarati; b. 1883, d. 1936) was born at Jambusar in district Bharuch of Gujarat. He had his Secondary education at Jambusar. In 1904 he came into contact with Swami Swayam Prakash, and studied philosophy and religion under his guidance. In 1909 he began writing poems under the pseudonym of 'Sagar'. He spent some time in the Himalayas, seeking spiritual illumination.

Sagar was a poet of buoyancy and is known as Mast Rangna Kavi. He blended Sufism and Vedanta in his poems. He adopted the imagery and style of the sufis and the form of ghazal. His poetic works are Thakelun hriday (The wearied heart, 1909) and Diwane Sagar, Parts I and II (The lunatic Sagar, 1916 & 1936). Thakelun hriday is a long narrative poem with a few songs interspersed in between. In this work the poet has experimented with free verse. Diwane Sagar contains his ghazals on various themes, social and personal. The best of them deal with the inner life of the poet—the longing of the individual soul, seeking union with the Universal Soul. Besides the ghazals, he has also tried his hand at other poetic forms such as garba (dance poems), bhajans, dramatic lyrics, and songs. His ghazals are compiled in Gujarati ghazalistan (1913) with a commentary on each poem. He has written some dialogues also on historical events. His letters were posthumously published in Patraresha (1938) which throw light on several facets of his life.

C.M.

SAGAR, LAHAREN AUR MANUSHYA (Hindi), published in 1956, is Uday Shankar Bhatt's novel which presents the life and struggles of fishermen. The mid-fifties was the period when the regional novel was taking shape in Hindi. The locale of this novel is the village of Varasova, near Bombay. The sea is the symbol of supreme power that dominates the lives of the fishermen. Not only is it a means of subsistence for them, but is also an agent of Nature that plays an important role in shaping their life-style, their thinking, their values and their conduct. The waves are the symbol of their consciousness. There is nothing attractive in the life of these unlettered, unsophisticated people except their human sensibility which impresses us by its genuineness.

The plot of the novel falls into four divisions named after the three main characters—Ratna, Manik, Ratna aur Manik, and Yashawant. Ratna represents the innate power of women, Manik the hedonistic values of society leading to degeneration of man, Yashwant the old tradition, partly worn out, though partly still vital and potent.

The novel has all the elements of a regional novel, focussing on the life of the people of a particular area, their customs, traditions, rituals, values and language. The theme centres round Ratna, a Kroli girl, discontented with life in Varasova and longing for the colourful life of Bomaby. She rebels against the convention but fails in her pursuit; yet she is undaunted in spirit. Her parents, Viththal and Vanshi, are better off than others in the village. Theirs is the only family which owns a pucca house, can afford a servant and send the child to school. Though Ratna could not complete her studies up to the intermediate level, yet her education made her familiar with the modern world. She is dissatisfied with the life-style of the fishermen and would not like to marry the village boy Yashwant. Incidentally she comes into contact with Manik and is trapped by his flamboyance. She dislikes the tea prepared at home but relishes the canteen tea. The faces on the cinema screen haunt her, but she dislikes the faces of the fishermen in her village. The attraction of Bombay makes her marry Manik, and now begins her encounter with some harsh realities. Deceived at every stage by Manik, she comes back to village. Next, she comes across Dhiruwala, a law practitioner, but his wantoness dismays her. Ultimately, she meets Dr Panduranga, a man who lives for his ideals, and she settles down with the job of a nurse in a dispensary at his behest.

The novel presents, in fact, not only the struggle of Ratna, but the socio-economic realities of life. Unlike other sections of Indian society, the fishermen's community is a female-dominated community. It is woman who is incharge of the house. The men go to the sea; when they come back, they drink and enjoy themselves. It is the women who go out to sell the fish and run the household. With them sexual morality too is not very rigid; in many cases it is a means of augmenting the family's income. The novel is, indeed, an authentic document on the socio-economic life of the Varasova fishermen.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The author's treatment of the theme is quite lively and credible. The reality of the situation is brought home by the use of the local dialect. It lays bare the sufferings of a poor community, and the stress and strain in the lives of persons exposed to feudal exploitation and individual licentiousness.

R.R.P.

SAGARANANDIN (Sanskrit; 11th c.) was a great writer on dramaturgy. His treatise Natakalakshana-ratnakosha is very famous, and has long been considered a source book on the principles of drama. While determining the date of a writer, it is useful to know a few historical details. Sagaranandin quotes in his work some verses from Viddhashalabhanjika and Karpuramanjari of Rajashekhara (last quarter of the 9th c. AD). Sarvananda wrote his commentary on the Namalinganushasana (Amarakosha) in AD 1158-59 which contains a few quotations from the Natakalakshana-ratnakosha. According to this evidence, Sagaranandin's date may be fixed to the second half of the eleventh century. No details about Sagaranandin's life can be known from his work except that he was born to the family of Mukuteshvara Nandi. Some scholars are of the opinion that Sagaranandin was a Jaina or a Buddhist. However, the author salutes Lord Shiva in the first verse of the work.

Besides Bharata, Sagaranandin refers to a number of important ancient authorities on Indian dramaturgy in his work, such as Matrigupta, Pahula, Ashmakutta and Nakhakutta, and attaches considerable importance to Matrigupta's views, in particular. Many later writers on dramaturgy have drawn extensively on Natakalakshana-ratnakosha. Vishvanatha, author of the celebrated Sahitya darpana, is indebted to Sagaranandin while considering the examples of Upa-rupakas and related illustrations. Saradatanaya, author of Bhava prakasha, has borrowed many ideas and illustrations from Sagaranandin's work. Such references indicate that Natakalakshana-ratnakosha occupies an important place in the history of Indian dramaturgy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Babudal Shukla, Natakalakshana-ratnakosha with Prabha Hindi commentary (Varanasi, 1972): M.M.Ghosh, Natyashastra (Calcutta); Siddheswar Chattopadhyaya, Natakalakshana-ratnakosha (Calcutta, 1974).

H.V.N.R.

SAGHAR NIZAMI (Urdu; b. 1905, d. 1984), real name Mohammed Samad Yar Khan, son of Sardar Mohammed Ahmad Yar Khan, was born at Aligarh. His great grandfather, Nawab Mohammed Abdur Rahman Khan, was the ruler of Jhajjar (in Haryana), who was martyred in the revolt of 1857. He was educated privately at home in Aligarh and was well-versed in Persian, Urdu and English. He married Zakia Sultana Nayyar, herself a noted poet, in 1943. Immediately after his marriage, he shifted to Pune and wrote songs and dialogues for the film 'Man ki jeet' of Shalimar Pictures. He wrote stories for films produced by Minerva Movitone in 1944 and also songs and stories for other films. Later, in 1944, he shifted to Bombay where he wrote for the films and, at the same time, continued his creative literary activities. In 1949, he revived the literary centre 'Hind Publishers' and brought out the journal, Asia.

In 1954, he left Bombay for Delhi and joined All India Radio as Literary Adviser, and later became Producer under the new arrangements. In 1965, he was promoted to the post of Deputy Chief Producer. He retired from All India Radio in 1972. In 1973, he joined the Pubications Division as Officer on Special Duty and was given a special assignment of writing an epic on India's Freedom Struggle.

In 1954, he visited Poland with a delegation sponsored by the Government and participated in the centenary celebrations of the great Polish Poet, Mickiewicz Adan. On his way back home, he visited London, Paris, Geneva, Rome and Cairo.

In January 1969, he was honoured by the President with 'Padma Bhushan'. In the process of his services in the field of literature and journalism, Saghar Nizami was honoured with a number of awards.

Saghar Nizami was a veteran literary journalist and edited Paimana, a monthly from Agra (1923), Mustaqbil, a monthly from Aligarh (1919), political and humorous weekly, Panch (1919), and Istiqlal, a political weekly (1919).

He has a number of literary works to his credit, and the more important of them are: Shahabiyat (1925), a collection of rubais, Mashaekh-e Marhara (1925), a historical work, Samundar ki devi (1926), short stories, Tahzeeb ki sarguzasht (1927), a long story, Subuhi (1932), a collection of ghazals, Kahkashan (1934), a collection of short stories, Bada-e-Mashraq (1935), a collection of patriotic ghazals and lyrics, Rang Mahal (1943), a collection of patriotic and revolutionary ghazals and lyrics, Mauj-o-Sahal (1948), collection of ghazals and lyrics, Shakuntala ((1960), a free poetic translation of Kalidas's drama, Anarkali (1963), a verse drama, Nehru nama (1967), a long poem Mashaale Azadi (1980), an epic based on the events of 1857 revolt, Part I, Mashaale Azadi, Part II, an epic on freedom struggle.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

R.G.

SAHAJANAND SWAMI (Gujarati; b. 1781, d. 1830) was originally from Chhapaiya in Uttar Pradesh, and after wandering from place to place in search of spiritual knowledge, he came to Gujarat in 1801 and founded a sect, called Swaminarayan sect or Sahajanand sect. Through his lectures he explained to the common people the tenets of spiritual life, with copious illustrations. He 'adopted' villages and tried to reform the people of the backward classes. Soon his sect became very popular and gathered into its fold the low and the downtrodden. His lectures are compiled and published in a book-form, entitled Vachanamruto. It is regarded as the first book in chaste Gujarati prose. His another book, Shishapatri, lays down the rules of conduct to be observed by the followers of his sect. Swamiji was, indeed, a missionary and many sadhus of his sect have produced rich devotional literature. Even people of the upper classes joined the sect. Several biographies have been written on him, the most noteworthy being the one by Kishorlal Mashruwala, associate of Mahatma Gandhi, and Nanalal, the poet.

C.M.

SAHAJIYA SADHANA (Oriya). The Buddhist tantric concept of 'Mahasukha', the Vaishnavite concept of 'Mahabhava', and the 'Premadharma' of Chaitanya prevalent in eastern India in the 15th and 16th centuries were united in the concept of 'Sahajiya sadhana'. By the 12th century AD the tantric Mahasukhavada had degenerated, and a large body of the Vaishnava devotees turned to the worship of Sri Krishna, describing at great length the amorous sports of the Lord with Radha and the gopis, thereby attributing divinity to the tantric 'Parakiyavada'. Jayadeva, the famous lyric poet, laid much stress on this Parakiyarati or 'Sahajasadhana' in his Gitagovinda. He sang of Radha's love; she was wife of another person, but completely surrendered herself to Krishna, her paramour. Jayadeva thus elevated the tantric parakiyavada, which operated at the social level, to the level of the extraordinary and the divine. Following Jayadeva, Chandidasa and Vidyapati sang of the union of 'Jiva' and 'Parama' in their description of the amorous sports of Srikrishna. Chaitanyadeva was also a great propounder of 'premabhakti' and established the supremacy of the 'Kantabhavashrita premadharma'.

The Vaishnava devotees described 'Kantabhavashritabhakti' as 'Prematmikabhakti' which, however, is not the same as 'Anasakta sadhana' of the Buddhists or the 'Yogamarga sadhana' of the Brahmajnanis, or the 'Kuchhrasadhana' of the Hathayogis. Following prematmikabhakti, the devotee dedicates himself to the Almighty: this is 'Sahaj marga', i.e. a simple way to salvation.

'Parakiyapriti' is the most important feature of Sahajiyasadhana. According to its central tenet every living being, as 'Prakriti', pines for union with the 'Parama', the 'Kanta' (husband), although wedded to worldliness. Like the secret love of a married woman for her paramour (parakiyanayaka), the entire mankind as Jiva wants to copulate with the Parama, the Para-purusa. Since this cult insists on no rigorous rituals, it is called Sahajapriti (natural love).

The Gaudiya devotees have attributed 'Gopibhava' to this devotional love. A few Gaudiya Gosvamis pursued the path of devotion, identifying themselves with the gopis. The union of the gopis with Srikrishna was 'parakiyapriti' in nature.

Amongst all the gopis, Radha was the most passionately devoted to Krishna. Therefore, Chaitanyadeva emulated Radha in her love and devotion, while chanting the name of the Lord. Other well-known devotees, Sanatana Goswami, Raghunatha Dasa, Gopala Bhatta, Raghunatha Bhatta and Jiva Gosvami indentified themselves with gopis like Rupamanjari, Lavanyamanjari, Ratimanjari, Gunamanjari, Rasamanjari and Vilasamanjari respectively. An entire literature was produced by these devotees and their followers to propagate the cult, which continued long as Bhakti marga. This literature is marked by amorous symbols, sublimation of passion and complete disregard for rituals and occult practices.

Ni.M.

SAHAJIYA SAHITYA (Bengali). Sahajiya is the name given by Haraprasad Shastri to a sect of Vaishnava-like mendicants who practised Tantricism in an esoteric manner. Composition and performance of songs publicly and privately was one of their distinctive characteristics. These songs carried hidden instructions for their disciplines and were couched in a form that offered entertainment to the public. The earliest specimens of such songs are the 'Charya' songs from Nepal, discovered by Shastri. These songs are written in an archaic form of Old Bengali and go back to the eleventh and twelfth centuries.

The term Sahajiya is derived from the word 'Sahaja' (literally, born in company, obtained from birth, natural adjunct, etc.). The practitioners of the esoteric cult termed their spiritual practice as 'Sahaja Dharma' or 'Sahaja Yana' (i.e. Natural law or Natural vehicle). The term really implied the natural course of life: eating, drinking, cohabiting and merry-making. That is to say, they did not believe in going away from the natural way of life and starving the body and the mind for hypothetical religious merit. But unlike the common people they restricted the demands of the body to the minimum.

Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

What they practised could be compared to Tantricism inasmuch as sexual intercourse was one of their practical processes. But they cannot be called Tantrics as there was no orgasm as in ordinary sexual practice, and they did not practise it for obtaining supernatural power. They were entirely natural.

The Sahajiyas were more akin to the Shaivas than to the Tantrics. Their residence, called Akhara (meaning, out-house for gymnastics), was like a miniature Shaiva monastery, but unlike the Shaivas they had no image or linga to worship. The Sahajiyas like the Natha Yogis had no god as such, as each one of them was god.

With the invasion of the Turks, the Sahajiyas went underground. Meanwhile, Sufism had arrived in Bengal in the thirteenth century, if not earlier. There is reason to believe that long before his escape Laksmanasena had come into close contact with a Muslim Pir who had exerted some influence at the court of the last great king of Bengal. In the subsequent centuries Sufi ideas influenced the Sahajiyas who had meanwhile remained shut off from the public eye. When Chaitanya came and preached the faith of love for God, the Sahajiyas who seem to have recruited some members from the Muslim faith also came out in the open under the banner of Vaishnavism. They were known as 'Baul', (i.e. a moron), and this name has remained stuck to them since the sixteenth century. Krishnadas Kaviraj in his Chaitanya charitamrita mentions a Master Baul (Mahabaula) and gives a description of him. It tallies with the picture of the Yogis drawn from the 'charya' songs. Since the days of Chaitanya the Bauls and the Sufis had come closer together, and the latter were later recognised as a sub-sect of the Bauls in the form of the Darvesh. In the nineteenth century, if we accept the popular classification, four classes of non-orthodox Vaishnava mendicants had emerged as Aul, Baul, Darvesh and Sai. The sect of the Auls was started in the eighteenth century by Ramsharan Pal who sponsored the cause of a spiritual prodigy, named Aulchand. This sect was influenced by the Christian faith, and as such it did not forbid women from congregational assembly. The sect was known as Kartabhaja (i.e. Worshipper of the Lord or Master). The influence of the Kartabhajas penetrated even to the harems of some eminent citizens in Calcutta in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries.

There is really no sect known as Sai. The word is a tadbhava (derivative) form of Svamin. It may mean the Shaiva and Vaishnava sannyasins who had started to play a public role in the middle of the nineteenth century, especially after the emergence of Theosophy and the 'Mahatmaism' of Olcott and Annie Basant. The Sahajiya cult or cults are known throughout by their literature which is contained in the lyric songs of didactic or spiritual matter, dressed apparently in such a form as to draw public interest to their entertainment value. At first such literary compositions were called charya (i.e. playacting role), and they were couplets or songs sung by a Sahajiya practitioner, dressed as a mimic dancer (nata) to educate the people and collect his ration.

Bengali literature begins with the charya songs written by more than a dozen writers from different esoteric sects having some contact with Buddhism, Shaivism and Nathism. These songs indicated the pattern of the Sahajiya songs of later days in Bengal. From Manasollasa (c. 1200) it appears that charya couplets and songs were known in other Indo-Aryan languages also. It was also cultivated in Avahattha which may be called Proto-New-Aryan. During the early sixteenth century the Bauls were already famous for their cryptic verses. Advaita Acharya, one of the best friends of Chaitanya, was a great scholar and also an expert in handling cryptic versification. Some time before Chaitanya's demise he had sent to the Master four lines of cryptic verse intimating his unhappiness at the overflow of Vaishnavism in Bengal which interfered with the normal public life. This is what he wrote to the Master through a messenger.

baul-ke kahio loke hoila baul
baul-ke kahio hate na bikay chaul baul-ke kahio kaje nahika aul baul-ke kahio iha kahiyache baul

(Tell the Baul (Chaitanya) that people have turned mad.
Tell the Baul that rice is not available in the market.
Tell the Baul that people are no longer at work.
Tell the Baul that this is spoken by a Baul.)

The bulk of Sahajiya lyrics is to be found in the anthologies of Vaishnava songs compiled in the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Some manuscripts were written mainly in the eighteenth century. Among such poems the most significant are those concerned with Chandidas. There were perhaps more than one poet by the name of Chandidas. There is one Chandidas who is great in Vaishnava poetry, but he is probably a myth, as the different accounts of the existence of such a poet do not go back earlier than the middle of the eighteenth century and, therefore, cannot be so adjusted as finally to lead to the conception of a single individual of that name. He seems to be a legendary figure—the figure of the hero of Sahajiya devotees.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Quite a fair number of Vaishnava Sahajiya lyrics are attributed to Chandidas as they bear the stamp of his signature, and many of these poems are important for a historical understanding of the Sahajiya thought. For instance, take the poem beginning with the line:

nityar adeshe basuli chalila
sahaj janabar tare.

(By the command of Nitya, Vasuli proceeded to meet Chandidas in order to initiate him in the Sahaja cult.)

There are four figures in this lyric: Nitya, Vasuli, Chandidas and a washerwoman. Nitya is the great Mother Goddess. Vasuli is her assistant, a competent Yogini. Chandidas is the young man whom Nitya favours, and the washerwoman stands for the companion of Chandidas in his esoteric practices.

The poem, carrying the signature of Chandidas, and others are fine specimens of what may be called the spiritual puzzle in Bengali.

There are some other works, most of them very small manuscripts of hardly more than ten folios, containing some tenets of the Sahajiya devotees who had adopted the Radha-Krishna love as symbolic of their own esoteric faith. For historical purposes the most important of such works is Vivartavilas of Akinchandas (18th c.). All such Sahajiya treatises refer to Chaitanya-charitamrita of Krishnadas Kaviraj as their ultimate authority.

Su.S.

SAHAL, KANHAIYALAL (Rajasthani; b. 1911, d. 1977), researcher and critic, was born at Nawalgarh in Shekhawati, Rajasthan. He took an M.A. degree in Hindi and Sanskrit, and was well versed in Gujarati, Marathi and Bengali also. His work on the cultural anecdotes of Rajasthan was published in two volumes, Rajasthan ke sanskritik upakhyan and Rajasthan ke aithihasik pravad. His work in the field of folk literature was well received in literary circles. He presented his doctoral thesis on the proverbs of Rajasthani, entitled Rajasthani kahavaten ek adhyayan. A collection each of proverbs, heroic tales, and folk tales stands to his credit. His best contribution in the field of research in medieval literature was in the form of editions of Draupad-vinaya and Virsatasai, partly done in collaboration with other scholars. He was a devoted scholar of Dingal and a critic of high calibre. He had a special interest in the derivational aspect of cultural words. He was responsible for starting a research journal Maru bharati from Pilani where he had served first as lecturer, then as Professor of Hindi, and finally as Principal of Birla College. It was in the pages of this journal that he published the Hindi translation of the folk epic Nihalde Sultan in three volumes.

Sahal was an equally able scholar of Hindi literature. His criticism in Hindi includes such works as Alochana ke path par, Samikshayan, Samikshanjali, Vad samiksha, Saket ke navam sarg ka kavya vaibhav, and Kamayani darshan (co-authorship).

He was a recipient of a good few awards and honours from the University Grants Commission, the University of Rajasthan, the Government of Uttar Pradesh, and the Bengal Hindi Mandal, Calcutta.

S.N.J.

SAHAY, RAGHUVIR (Hindi; b. 1929, d. 1990) received his M.A. degree in English from Lucknow University in 1951. From 1951 to 1952 he was Assistant Editor of the Hindi magazine Pratik, and was Co-editor of the magazine Kalpana from 1957 to 1958. The next two years he was a special correspondent of the All India Radio, after which he joined the Hindi daily, Navbharat Times, as special correspondent (1963-1968). He was editor of the Hindi weekly Dinman (1971-1982).

Raghuvir Sahay has written both prose (short stories, a novel, and essays) and poetry. He has also translated several works of prose and poetry from English into Hindi. Of these, the most significant is his translation of Shakespeare's Macbeth under the title Barnam Vana. Several of his poems have been included in the anthologies of Hindi poetry, of which the most significant is Doosra saptak (1950) edited by Agyeya.

Raghuvir Sahay's prose and poetry are closely connected to the traditional oral recitative genre of Indian literature. The verbal music of his lines is significant, since even when is not deliberately musical, he is seldom far away from it. It was, therefore, but natural that he should employ rhyme schemes, traditional or unconventional. In Barnam vana he has made an interesting use of the traditional 'kavitta' form. Due to this, his work has a rhetorical quality and a natural predilection for dramatic monologues.

Sahay's poetry of politico-cultural criticism centres

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

around the individual as victim. The treatment is always ironical and heavily laced with humour and pathos, both of which coalesce in his work. Occasional flashes of verbal horse-play and journalistic flavour are the other salient features of his work.

Raghuvir Sahay's short stories and essays deal mostly with the lower-middle class urban life. They also display humour and intensity of observation as his poems do. Often the degree of intensity he brings to bear on the subject is such as to make even common incidents and characters take on an extraordinary quality. His language makes equally good use of the traditional colloquial idiom of the town, the journalistic jargon, and the quaint archaic idiom of the early Hindi poets. His intense involvement with the basic concepts of democracy and the human side of the system it generates make his work an interesting and thoughtful commentary on Indian life in our times.

His works include: Poetry: Sidhiyon par dhoop mein (1959), Atma hatya ke viruddha (1967), Hanso hanso jaldi hanso (1975), Log bhool gaye hain (1982): Prose: Kitne anjane (novel, 1967), Vivekanand (biography, 1968), Rasta idhar se hai (Short stories, 1972), Kothri ki kaid (novel, 1975); Translation: (English to Hindi) Barah Hungarian kahaniyan (stories), Barnam vana (Shakespeare's Macbeth).

M.P.

SAHAY, SHIVAPUJAN (Hindi; b.1893, d. 1963), short story writer, novelist, biographer, journalist, was born at Unwas in the Shahabad district of Bihar. He belonged to a middle class family. His father, Munshi Ishwari Dayal, was a minor offical of the Dumraon Raj, and knew Urdu and Persian. Shivapujan learnt Urdu and Persian at the village Madrasa, the traditional school attached to the village mosque, and did his matriculation from the Kayastha Jubilee Academy, Arrah, in 1912. In his personal life, he was a Sanatanist, an ardent devotee of Rama and the Ramayana. He began his career as a clerk at Varanasi, became a teacher at the Arrah National School (1920-21), and taught at Rajendra College, Chhapra (1939-49). From 1950 to 1959 he was Director of the Bihar Rashtra Bhasha Parishad and President of the All India Hindi Sahitya Sammelan in 1944. In 1960, he received the title of Padma Bhushan.

His books include Prem pushpanjali (poems, 1921), Bhishma pitamaha (1922), Arjun (1923), Dehati duniya (fiction, 1926), Vibhuti (fiction, 1930), Mahila mahattva (sketches, 1922), Do ghadi (light essays), Bihar ka vihar (Bihar: Journey and Survey, 1919), Rashtrapati Rajendra Prasad jivan-darshan (Biography, 1949) and Annapurna ke mandir mein (essays on village life).

He was a nationalist and a Gandhian writer. From 1921 to 1947, he propagated the ideals of non-violence, satyagraha, communal harmony and the boycott of foreign goods. He was greatly influenced by Mahatma Gandhi and Bal Gangadhar Tilak whose Gita rahasya was only second to the Ramacharitmanas of Tulsidas in moulding his life and thinking. Camil Bulke, the noted Belgian authority on the Ramayana, was a personal friend of Shivapujan Sahay. He was also influenced by the poetry of Nirala and Prasad.

A prolific writer, he wrote about 400 short stories, 69 biographies and over 150 literary articles. His Dehati duniya is, perhaps, the first regional novel in Hindi.

His contribution to Hindi literary journalism is also noteworthy. He edited and published many journals, including Marwari sudhar, Mauji, Golmal Adarsha, Upanyas-tarang, Samanvaya (all from Calcutta), besides Madhuri, Ganga, Balak, Himalaya and Sahitya (1950-1962).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Nayee dhara: Shivapujan commemoration volume (Patna, 1963); Shivapujan rachnavali, 4 Vols (Patna, 1965).

S.Y.M.

SAHGAL, NAYANTARA (English; b. 1927). The second of the three daughters of R.S. Pandit (distinguished Sanskrit scholar and lawyer) and Vijayalakshmi Pandit, Nayantara spent much of her childhood at Anand Bhavan, the ancestral home of the Nehrus in Allahabad. She went to school in Poona, and later attended Woodstock, an American missionary school near Mussourie, staying with a governess, as both her parents were frequently in jail because of their participation in the freedom struggle. When she was eighteen, she went to the U.S.A. where she graduated from Wellesley College, Massachusetts. For some time after her return to India, she lived with her uncle Jawaharlal Nehru in New Delhi, and her novels show a close acquaintance with the political personalities of the day. She also had opportunities for observing the life of the Indian Foreign Service when she visited her mother, who represented India in Britain, the U.S.S.R. and the United Nations. Nayantara Sahgal's autobiographies, Prison and Chocolate Cake (1954) and From Fear Set Free (1962), throw much light on the Nehru family and the affluent circumstances in which she grew up.

Her novels have a political background, and some of the characters are easily recognizable, such as Kailash (V.K. Krishna Menon) in This Time of Morning and Shivraj (Jawaharlal Nehru) in A Situation in New Delhi. She is at her best when personal concerns take precedence over the political scene as in The Day in Shadow, a novel whose heroine is a divorcee like Nayantara herself. Nayantara's novels effectively present the life of the rich section of society, with its hypocrisy and shallow values; at the same time, the novelist is concerned with the Indian heritage and its validity for the western educated modern Indian. In addition to her novels and biographies, she has also written a weekly political column for the newspaper, The Indian Express.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Her other works include: (Novels) A Time to be Happy (1958), Storm in Chandigarh (1969); also A Voice for Freedom (Speeches and writings about India under the Emergency, pub. 1977) and A History of the Freedom Movement (1970). Her novel, Rich Like Us won the Sahitya Akademi Award (1986).

S.A.N.

SAHI, PRATAP (Hindi, 19th c.) was born in a family of bards of Bundelkhanda, and patronised by Maharaja Vikram Simha, the ruler of Charakhari. He stayed for some time at the court of Chhatrasal Parnapurandar too at Panna. Remembered as a poet, poetician and commentator, Pratap Sahi wrote his works between 1823-1843. Though eight books have been attributed to him, namely Jayasimha Prakash, Shringar manjari, Vyangyartha kaumudi, Shringar shiromani, Alankar chintamani, Kavya vilasa, Jugal nakhashikha and Rasachandrika, only Vyangyartha kaumudi (1825) and Kavya vilasa (1829) have been traced so far. Both the books are on poetics or rhetoric. His other works are commentaries on Bhashabhushan Rasaraj, Nakhashikh (by Balabhadra) and Satsai (by Bihari). Vyangyartha kaumudi has two parts. Part I consists of 130 verses, mostly on the classification of the heroes (nayaka) and heroines (nayika). The poet has based his classification on the work of Bhanu Mishra and there is nothing original about it. In Part II he has tried to explain the subject both in prose and in verse. Though the main subject is nayaka-nayika bheda, he has written on figures of speech and dhvani (suggestive meaning) too. The other work Kavya vilasa consists of 411 verses, divided into six parts. Both these works not only lack originality, but they show that the author, without going into the depth of the subject, has tried to follow the Sanskrit Acharyas like Kulpati, Bhanu Mishra, etc. who preceded him. His only contribution to the subject is that he has tried to make his work as simple and interesting as possible, giving erotic verses as illustrations.

As a poet, Pratap Sahi is more successful. In theory he maintained that suggestive meaning is the soul of poetry, and tried to practise the theory in his own verse. These verses not only startle the reader, but touch his emotion too. With his flight of imagination and chaste diction, he impresses the reader. With him the period of Ritikalin poetry comes to an end. He was the last poet of this phase, deeply involved in rhetoric and trying to explain the subject with lucidity of exposition, in a language chaste and simple.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Nagendra (ed.), Hindi sahitya ka vrihat itihas (1973); S.D. Chaudhary, Ritikalina acharyon ki den.

S.S.G.

SAHI, VIJAYDEV NARAIN (Hindi; b.1924, d.1982) was born at Banaras, Uttar Pradesh, and did his M.A. in English from Allahabad University in 1948. He taught at Kashi Vidyapith for sometime and later moved to Allahabad University in 1951. Inspired by Acharya Narendra Dev and Ram Manohar Lohia he was actively involved in the socialistic movement, but became disinterested in politics after Lohia's death.

Sahi was associated with the New Poetry movement in Hindi, and was for some time assistant-editor of Nai kavita and Alochana. His poems were first published in Nai kavita and Tisra saptak, and reflected modern consciousness and its tensions. A certain romantic sensibility, intensity of feeling and interaction with life give his poems a special character. Poems like 'Dard ki Devpaga', 'Dopahar', 'Nadi sthan', and 'Vishkanya' are exercises in self-expression dealing with the failure and achievement of man's existence. We find an aura of dream and imagination in these poems and also a feeling of longing and of despair. Such poems as 'Hava chalo' and 'Is ghar ka suna angan' express these feelings again with great sensitivity.

Machli ghar is a collection of his poems revealing, in the main, the poet's sense of disorientation in life. Essentially, a man of faith, Sahi seems to be entangled in a life of contradictions. His 'self' seeks expression; 'fantasy' and 'reality' are at a criss-cross.

Sahi has chosen a cluster of images, having their source in the sub-conscious and the unconscious, the source of magic, of blind alleys and caves, caravans and shrieking voices. Through the medium of these images and symbols, the loneliness of man in a world of distortions and tensions tries to seek its powerful expression in his poetry.

Gov. R.

SAHIR LUDHIANWI (Urdu; b.1921, d.1980), real name Abdul Haee, was Urdu poet and lyricist of immense renown. Sahir was born in a family of the landlords at

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Ludhiana (Punjab). His father, Fazal Muhammed of Muslim Gujar extraction, was given to a very luxurious life almost beyond his means, which was not liked by his eleventh wife from Kashmir. Relations between them were strained and this led to ultimate divorce. It was ruled by the Court that Sahir, who was a mere child, would live with his mother. This episode and the situation of a broken home as it existed at that time, left an indelible mark of misery on the mind of Sahir. This psychological effect on him continued so long as he was alive and, much later, in one of his poems he expressed the disappointment thus:

Mere mazi ko andhere mein daba rahne do
Mera mazi meri zilat ke siva kuchh bhi nahin.

(Let my past remain buried in the darkness
My past is nothing other than my disgrace).

It seems he lived with his past all through his life.

Passing the Matriculation examination, Sahir joined Govt. College, Ludhiana to pursue his higher studies. He was, however, expelled from college for his active participation in the activities of the All India Students Federation, a Communist Party of India mouthpiece. He joined Dayal Singh College, Lahore, from where also he was expelled for the same reasons. By this time he was in the thick of political activities. All the same he established himself as a poet to reckon with. Sahir's poetry mainly follows the progressive trend.

Sahir, during this period, edited the journals like Adab-e-latif (Lahore), Savera (Lahore) and Shahkar (Delhi), and, at the same time, progressed further in his poetic career and became one of the frontliners of the progressive poetic trend. Shortly after that he left for Bombay and settled there to write songs for the films.

Many renowned critics and poets like Majnu Gorakhpuri, Firaq Gorakhpuri, Naz Siddiqi, etc., have paid glowing tributes to Sahir's poetic calibre and stature. His lyrics are superb which, besides being soul stirring, educate and socialise the reader. His patriotism, the desire for a better life and beautiful future for the poor masses and the downtrodden, rebellion against the alien rule, crusade against the enemies of society, and above all his commitment to the humanity as a whole form the staple of his poetry. In the foreword to Gaata jae banjaara (a collection of his film songs), Sahir says, "I have all along endeavoured to bring film songs closer to creative poetry and utilize them as a vehicle for conveying modern social and political ideologies to the masses." He remained true to his convictions and used his verse as a vehicle for creating an awakening with a view to ushering in a social order free from exploitation, poverty, misery and disease.

The other poetical works to Sahir's credit are Talakhian (1944), Parchhaiyan (1955) and Aao ke koi khwab bunen (1973). The only prose work to his credit is Devindra Sattiyarthi (1948), a biography.

Sahir's poetic talents brought him Soviet Land-Nehru Award (1973) and Maharashtra Urdu Academy Award (1973). The President of India honoured him with the title of Padma Shri in 1973.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Majnu Gorakhpuri, 'Sahir Ludhianwi' in Sabras; Makhmur Saeedi, Sahir Ludhianwi: Ek mutala (1981); Naz Siddiqi, Sahir: Shakhs aur shair; Prakash Pandit, Sahir aur uski shairi.

T.R.

SAHITYA (Bengali) by Rabindranath Tagore is a collection of essays on different aspects of literature published in different magazines between 1904 and 1907. This work, along with Sahityer pathe (1936) and Sahityer swarup, demonstrates Tagore's versatility as a literary critic. In fact, he was one of the first writers in India to establish and apply the canons of literary taste and judgement for a comprehensive assessment of literary texts. His close familiarity with Sanskrit literature and his wide acquaintance with the literature of Europe instilled in him a sense of the value of criticism as an independent form of literary activity. In the essays of Sahitya Tagore discusses almost all aspects related to the creation and scope of literature. In the first essay 'Sahityer tatparya' (The meaning of literature) he discusses the factors which contribute to the making of literature. In the essay 'Sahityer samagri' (The materials of literature) he discusses the relation between the writer and the reading public. He makes fun of those writers who assert that they write only for their own pleasure and could not care less for their readers. These writers claim that they are like birds that sing out of joy and the readers only hear them. Tagore points out that the music of the birds may not be meant for the society of birds, but the compositions of the poets are meant only for the readers. According to him, keeping an eye on the audience does not necessarily mean detraction from the inherent quality of a work of art: 'The mother's milk is meant only for the child, but that does not mean that it is not spontaneous.' In the essay 'Sahitya bicharak' (The judge of literature) he distinguishes between literary truth and everyday truth of life. In nature, he says, we are concerned with immediate and verifiable truths whereas literature deals with truths which are remote, ineffable and beyond our naked eyes. The essay 'Saundaryabodh' (Sense of beauty) discusses the difference between sensuous beauty and transcendent beauty. He points out how the sense of transcendent or sublime beauty emanates from a deeper understanding of an object or state of mind and how intimately it is linked up with the good of the humanity. In the essay 'Bishwa sahitya' (World literature) he discusses the need for releasing oneself from the narrow confines of regional or national literature and seeing the face of the Universal Man through the study of the literature of different lands. In the essay 'Sahitya srishti' (Creation of literature), he deals with the process of literary creation. This essay contains several illuminating insights into how a poet or a writer is inspired, how he is impelled to create, and how emotions and feelings are engendered in the mind of the writer through his relationship with the external world. One remembers what Tagore says elsewhere in the book, that the poet stakes his claim to his vocation with his power to express. One who looks at beauty in the heaven and remains dumb like the sky is not a poet. The fuel that is not ignited is not fire. In the essay 'Aitihasik upanyas' (The historical novel) he points out the need of striking a balance between the facts of history and the demands of art. The remaining essays in this volume are 'Bangla jatiya sahitya' (The national literature in Bengali), 'Banga bhasa o sahitya' (Bengali language and literature) and 'Kabi jibani' (The life of the poet).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Many of Tagore's critical judgements emanate from his own practice as a poet and a creative artist. He does not deal with abstraction but always substantiates his point with illustrations from literary texts, Indian and European. Whatever he says, he says with a conviction rare among the critics, and it rings true and authentic.

Mo.A.

SAHITYA DARPANA (Sanskrit) is a monumental work in Sanskrit poetics, written by Vishvanatha Kaviraja (14th c.) It is a compendium of the rules governing poetic craft, believed to have been written in the year 1384. There are also detailed discussions on the science of dramaturgy.

Sahitya darpana (Mirror of composition) is modelled on Mammata's Kavya prakasha. Vishvanatha was, perhaps, inspired to compose Sahitya darpana after he had written a commentary on Kavya prakasha. But unlike Mammata, Vishvanatha adopts the style of 'karika' and 'vritti'– he deals with the subject in 798 karikas, dividing it into ten 'paricchedas', followed by vritti.

The first chapter of Sahitya darpana deals with the definition of kavya. He refutes the observations of others and offers his own definition: 'Vakyam rasatmakam kavyam' (Kavya is a composition having rasa as its soul). This definition renders any poetic composition without rasa unpoetic and has lad to criticism by subsequent authors. However, it is the focus of the book, around which Vishvanatha builds a consistently expounded theory of rasa-dhvani.

In the second chapter, Vishvanatha minutely discusses the three qualities of a word—abhidha, lakshana and vyanjana—preceded by definitions of word and meaning (shabda and artha). The third chapter describes exhaustively in 267 karikas the concept of rasa with all its ramifications. The fourth divides kavya into dhvani-kavya and gunibhutavyangya-kavya, the one where suggestion is predominant and the other, where it is subordinated. Both are, however, kavyas because they are imbued with rasa. The fifth chapter is devoted to a detailed discussion of the suggestive power (vyanjana shakti) of words; here he discusses the two viewpoints of the two sub-schools of Purvamimasa and effectively refutes them, as he does with the view which holds 'vyangya' to be an inference rather than an independent entity.

The sixth chapter of Sahitya darpana deals with dramatic art. In 337 karikas, it offers a detailed analysis of all aspects of drama. The seventh and eighth chapters deal respectively with the defects and merits (doshas and gunas) of a poetic composition. The ninth chapter discusses the styles (vritti) - Vaidarbhi, Gaudi, Panchali and Lati. Vishvanatha defines 'riti' as an arrangement of words in the manner of the composition of body and which is of assistance to rasas.

Vishvanatha thus explains his theory of poetics consistently with the view that unless a literary composition is imbued with rasa, it cannot be treated as kavya. Rasa is the very soul of kavya. It follows that a composition devoid of its soul cannot be termed as kavya. This view thus excludes from its scope those compositions which are 'laukika' in character and which are sub-divided into 'vastudhvani' and 'alamkaradhvani', both of which can be apprehended on the basis of and by their dependence upon the words and their meanings and not independently of them, which a true kavya, an 'alaukika kavya' (a kavya with its soul, rasa) does. This view of Vishvanatha has been subjected to criticism by the subsequent writers as too narrow. But, however, this view is consistent with the basic premise that rasa is the soul of poetry. It has been the strength, and also perhaps the weakness of Sahitya darpana to point out the inescapable logical implication of the theory in a spirited manner.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R. Balantyne and P.D. Misra (tr.), Sahitya darpana (Bibliotheca Indica, 1875); Karunakara Kavyatirtha (ed.), Sahityadarpana with Lochana and Vigyapriya commentaries (La-hore, 1938); P.V. Kane (ed.), The Sahityadarpana of Visvanatha (Paricchedas I, II and X), History of Poetics, 3rd ed. (Bombay, 1951); S.K. De, History of Sanskrit Poetics (Calcutta, 1960).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

H.J.Z.

SAHITYA MANJARI (Malayalam) is a collection of shorter poems written by the great Malayalam poet Vallattol running into eleven volumes. The first seven volumes were published between 1917 and 1930 (i-1916, ii-1919, iii-1922, iv-1924, v-1925, vi-1927, vii-1930), the most creative period of the poet's literary career. The eighth volume was published after a lapse of twenty years in 1950, and the last three were brought out posthumously between 1959 and 1970 (ix-1959, x-1964, xi-1970). While the first eight volumes presented the development of the poet in chronological order, the last three included poems spread over half a century unpublished in the previous ones.

Sahitya manjari (Florilegium of literature) was a landmark in the history of Malayalam poetry as well as in the literary career of the poet. It heralded a new style in Malayalam poetry. Vallattol wrote a mahakavya, Chitrayogam, in 1914 and a few long narrative poems (khanda-kavyas), and established himself as a traditionalist and a neo-classicist. This series consisting of 116 short lyrics in the first seven volumes marked the transition of the poet from classicism to romanticism, a movement which made much headway in the coming years.

In Sahitya manjari, Vallattol's poetic craft underwent a sea change. Indigenous Malayalam metres had almost become out of vogue by the time these volumes were published. Though the old masters wrote their masterpieces in Malayalam metres till the eighteenth century, the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries witnessed a revival of the stately syllabic quadruplets of Sanskrit prosody; they almost drove the rhythmic folk metres out of use. Vallattol, by reviving the old musical metres with superb mastery, made poetry popular and lyrical. The high-flown Sanskrit vocabulary and artificial figures were increasingly replaced by native idioms and usages. The free and lyrical measures and the expressive nuances of local language which found expression in these volumes revolutionized the poetic idiom.

Sahitya manjari became immensely popular with the common man mainly because the volumes were imbued with an ardent spirit of nationalism. The opening poem of the first volume, 'Matrivandanam' (Salutation to the Mother, 1918), a poem on Kerala, is an example of worship to the Motherland. A poem on Mahatma Gandhi entitled 'Ente gurunathan' (My master, 1923) included in the fourth volume sees the Father of the nation as an embodiment of the ideals of ancient India:

> If you wish to see
> The renunciation of Lord Christ,
> The strategy of Lord Krishna in defence of Dharma,
> The Ahimsa of Lord Buddha,
> The intellectual might of Shri Shankara,
> The infinite mercy of Rantideva,
> The truthfulness of Harishchandra
> And the intrepidity and constancy of Mohammed
> Blended in perfect harmony in one person,
> Go to my Master, or at least read his story.

Vallattol's nationalism glorifies India's golden past. His desire for freedom for foreign domination sometimes drives him to dislike western civilization. His ignorance of the English language and western culture may have prejudiced him to such an extent that he could not perhaps make an objective assessment of western civilization. In the poem 'Ningal tan pokku viparitamakola' (Don't go perverse), he wrote:

> All the colourful splendour you see
> Is the last blaze of setting glory;
> Where it is dawn everyday,
> There let us go.
> To face declining west is
> In the nature of darkness.

One sees Vallattol as a poet of nature especially in the early volumes of Sahitya manjari, such as 'Oru dinanta sancharam' (An evening walk, 1914) 'Ulnattile manju kalam' (Writer in a countryside 1913), 'Oru toni yatra' (A voyage by a country boat, 1920), 'Tirur-Ponnani Puzha' (The Tirur-Ponnani river, 1917), etc. He takes immense delight in presenting the pictorial beauty of the Kerala landscape. He sees nature as God's gift and draws sustenance from it. Animate objects like birds and animals take up his fancy, and become the subjects of his poems. He has special love for the peasants whose life is inseparable from nature.

Sahitya manjari comprises many short narrative poems portraying incidents both from contemporary life and from the world of the puranas and history. These poems are highly dramatic and vigorous, though lacking in the complexities of psychology and subtleties of moral judgement as in the case of his great contemporary, Kumaran Asan. His re-creations of puranic and historical episodes and situations have a contemporary revelance. His portrayal of tender feelings like shringara and vatsalya in these poems has been rated highly by critics.

Sahitya manjari presents the sum total of Vallatol's genius. In this work, he combines the best tradition of Indian poetry like clarity, precision, polish and relevance and the sweetness and delicacy of the native tongue. There was no poet among Vallattol's younger contemporaries who was not influenced by the Vallattol school, of which the volumes of Sahityamanjari remain the best specimen.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B. Hrdayakumari, Vallathol (New Delhi, 1974); N.V. Krishna Warrior, Vallatholinte kavyashilpam (Trivandrum, 1977); V. Unnikrishnan Nair, Vallathol (Calicut, 1972).

O.M.A.

SAHITYA SARU (Sindhi) is a collection of essays by Tirth Basant (b. 1909), one of the foremost prose writers in Sindhi. Basant is a free-lance writer and the only example of a litterateur who earns his living through writtings.

Sahitya saru (The essence of literature, 1961) is a collection of literary essays which was awarded a prize by Watumal Gobindram Foundation, USA, in 1963. It contains ten essays out of which four deal with theoretical criticism on the various genres of literature, viz. 'Tanqid' (Criticism), 'Shairu' (Poetry), 'Kilka-kala' (Art of writing) and 'Anuvad-kala' (Art of translation). 'Kavi Kalidasa' and 'Iqbal' present an introductory study of the two poets. 'Qaomi geet' (National songs) and 'Cheenee shair' are informative essays. 'Bhasha vigyan' (Science of language) deals with the development of linguistics, while 'Jan piyo jiu, tan piyo sikhu' (Keep learning while living) dilates on the importance of acquiring more and more knowledge.

Tirth Basant has made a wide study of many subjects, and therefore, his writings are mostly thought-provoking; but they generally lack a systematic analysis of the subject-matter. The language of Basant often contains uncommon Persian and Sanskrit words which the Sindhi language has not yet absorbed, with the result that these words mar the lucidity of style. But, on the other hand, for the expression of new ideas, Basant has coined a good number of English technical terms in Sindhi.

Basant entered the field of Sindhi literature with the publication of a collection of his personal essays, entitled Chinigoon (Sparks, 1940), which included a foreword by Hyder Bux Jatoi. The book is highly appreciated for its new outlook and forceful style. During the same year, he also translated Jawahar jiwani (An autobiography of Jawaharlal Nehru) which, though awarded a prize by the Education Department in 1941, was severely criticised for being the most unfaithful translation of the original. Tirth Basant is the first Sindhi writer whose biographical work Kanwar was picked up for Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1959.

Basant has to his credit more than thirty works most of which are critical works and collections of his personal essays. He has contributed in the field of play-writing also. Basant's translations of Shakespeare's plays Othello and Antony and Cleopatra into Sindhi are marked for their language and style.

M.K.J.

SAHITYA SHASTRA (Sanskrit). The earliest poets of India who composed the hymns of the Rig Veda, and even Valmiki and Vyasa, did not have a guiding critical work before them to regulate the form or content of their poetry. They composed literary works on the basis of an instinctive and intuitive understanding of the requirements of poetics. In every land literature developed earlier than the grammar of the language and the philosophy of poetry. In India, too, Panini's sutras on grammar and Yaska's etymology developed much after the first Vedas had been written, and the first concepts of poetics were discussed in their works in a tentative fashion. In fact, the two critical thinkers were primarily concerned with the simile and no other figure of speech or element of literary theory.

The earliest writer on this subject giving the first proper shape to critical thinking, and enunciating a literary theory that still holds the field, was Bharata, the author of Natyashastra. As the title implies, it is a work on drama with detailed instructions for all significant stages in the production of a play. At the same time, the passage spelling out the Rasa theory, is of primary importance despite its brevity. It has been commented upon by a number of writers, the most important being Abhinavagupta who has also commented on another great work, Dhvanyaloka, in the same area.

A third work which throws considerable light on the question why some poems please and others do not is Auchitya vichara charcha by Kshemendra. He contends that propriety is everything and only the improper elements in a poem always create the effect of a warp upon it. A fourth writer whose views are of some importance is Kuntaka. He believed that it is vakrokti or an oblique expression that marks off poetry from non-literary writing. The fifth writer relevant to the discussion is Jagannatha Panditaraja whose Rasagangadhara contains many innovative ideas in poetics.

The first question that we have to answer while dealing with poetics is what poetry is and there are various definitions of poetry offered by various schools. One good definition prescribes the concept that the very life of poerty is the communication of a feeling of relish to the reader. Asvadjeevatuh padasandarbhvah kavyam (a concatenation of words giving relish is poetry). This concept is much fancied by the rasa and the dhvani schools of poetics. A very acceptable definition would be what has been offered by Jagannatha Panditaraja: Ramaneeyarthapratipadakah sabdah kavyam (the combination of words which yields an enjoyable sense is poetry).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Though schools may formulate definitions differently, they are all agreed on the purpose of poetry which is to induce pleasure in the mind of the dilettante. Poetry is often used to teach morals and propagate religious dogma. It gets debased in the hands of some who even use it to slander people or flatter undeserving persons. None of these, however, can constitute the real purpose of poetry. Its true purpose can only be the production of delight, all other purposes are only subsidiary and none of them should be accorded importance by the poet, the critic, and the lay reader.

Another theme that is dealt with by most writers on Sahitya Shastra is an analysis of the factors and faculties which are necessary in a poet to enable him to compose poetry. Everyone agrees on good scholarship and continued practice as the two basic requirements for the composition of good verse. To get transformed into poetry a third quality is inescapably needed for verse and it is called 'pratibha'. It is an extremely subtle faculty that enables a poet to envision beauty in things which others dismiss as banal and to transfer his vision to the dilettante without the loss of their impact. From the terms used here it would appear that it is a very unusual quality gifted only to a few humans, whom Bhatta Tauta calls rishis, a rishi being one who sees visions: Rishishcha kila darshanat. What is meant, of course, is a special kind of perception that reveals the inner beauty of things not visible to oridinary men.

Bharata in his brief sutra, vibhavanubhavavyabhicharisamyogadrasanishpattih, i.e. poetic relish is in the relationship between the emotions, the external manifestations and the fleeting moods), sums up the manner in which, he feels, a sense of enjoyment is induced in the dilettante through the agency of art. As the passage is very brief, many interpretations are possible and at least four are accorded special importance by writers on poetics.

Before we deal with the four interpretations, it is necessary to explain the terms used in the sutra and one not used in it which, however, is of pivotal importance. Vibhavas are the fundamental determining elements of emotions, for example, the excitants like the spring season, the blossoming of flowers and the rise of the moon which evoke the basic impulse of rati (love). The external manifestations like glances and a smile are called anubhavas. Vyabhichari (or sanchari) bhavas are fleeting or secondary moods which serve to manifest fully the dominant moods, like ennui and despondency. The word sthayibhava which does not occur in the sutra but which is of fundamental importance indicates the dominant mood which, though influenced by the other bhavas, is never altogether dominated by them. So the general meaning of the sutra seems to be that when the dominant mood in the dilettante is influenced by the exciting elements of the three kinds referred to earlier, it attains to a specific mental state that produces the delight. The dominant mood is recognised to have eight aspects, such as love, sorrow, etc. corresponding to the eight sentiments.

Out of the four, Lollata feels that in the case of a play the dilettante's enjoyment arises from his appreciation of the clever representation by the actor of the feelings of the character. Shankuka's interpretation is based on the concept that the actor by clever imitation of the mental state of the character becomes for the moment the character himself. The spectator forgets, again for the moment, that the actor and the character are different and he infers the rasa from the mental state of the actor and experiences delight.

Bhattanayaka strongly disagrees with Shankuka pointing out that rasa or relish can never be inferred. The experiences of the characters transferred by the actors, with their specific localising elements removed, to the personality of the dilettante produces a state of mind comparable to the experience of brahmananda or beatitude. His is a very philosophical explanation and it may turn out to be the nearest to truth.

Abhinavagupta's view is that love and other moods dormant in man get transformed, on their arousal by the various agencies, into rasa which is relishable even when the dominant mood is one of sorrow. He had a clear concept of the transfer of experience involved in the process of the enjoyment of art (a concept that the west has discovered and labelled only recently). He understood and used effectively the other concept of universalisation which involves the artistic experience losing, upon its transfer to the dilettante, its specificity and its localising and personalising elements.

For some centuries there has been a debate on the question: What constitutes the soul of poetry? Dandi, Bhamaha and Udbhata maintained that figures of speech (alankaras) constituted the soul of poetry. Vamana pleaded for the enthronement of riti or tenor as the soul, and his concept of the riti meant a set of qualities mostly related to the manner of composition. Rasa, however, came to be accepted as the soul of poetry by the largest number of writers, particularly after the advent of Anandavardhana, the author of Dhvanyaloka.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Anandavardhana and Abhinavagupta (who wrote a brilliant gloss on the former's innovative work) felt that the suggestive value of a work is of much greater importance than what is indicated by the surface meaning. They argued that rasa can never be well relished unless it is suggested, and they considered rasadhvani or suggested rasa as the real soul of poetry. Their prestige was so high that all opposition to this view was crushed and their theory has ruled the critical opinion to this day. While admittedly suggestion is an important aspect, perhaps Anandavardhana over-emphasised its importance.

Kshemendra contributed a distinctly new idea—that of auchitya or propriety. He examined it against a very large number of aspects in a poem and showed how propriety of subject, sentiment, diction, alankaras, etc. is vital in order to secure the relishability of a creative work. Some of his concepts appear to anticipate the theory of genre criticism discovered and propagated by American critics after the Second World War.

Kuntaka's Vakroktijivita is a cleverly argued exposition of a theory that words and passages contain a certain striking turn of ideas which owe their origin to the poet's fancy and constitute poetry. Kuntaka puts his entire emphasis on the manner in which a poem is written and this constitutes the serious limitation inherent in his theory, since a great poem is counted great not only on account of its unusual, even unique, manner of presentation of the subject matter, because the criteria for judging greatness go much deeper.

Jagannatha Panditaraja, whose definition has been discussed earlier, had a contribution to make to our understanding of the constituents of true poetry. He expresses his concept with the help of a very evocative word, 'alaukika', which can be interpreted to mean unworldly, non-utilitarian, the very opposite of what is denoted by earthy pragmatism. While books of knowledge are most useful to man precisely because they are pragmatic and worldy, creative literature has to be alaukika purveying a non-utilitarian benefit, viz. delight. This, certainly, is a new way of looking at creative literature and we owe it to Jagannatha who is rightly regarded as the last great writer on sahitya shastra in Sanskrit.

A.V.S.

SAHITYIK SAKSHATKAR (Hindi), is a collection of Ranavir Rangra's articles, based on his literary interviews with eminent Hindi writers over a period of two decades. These articles, though published in various magazines from time to time, were first brought out in a book-form in 1968 under the title Srijan ki manobhumi. The present volume, published in 1978, is its revised and enlarged edition and contains forty-one interviews with twenty-nine eminent writers, such as Maithilisharan Gupta, Vrindavanlal Varma, Sumitranandan Pant, Bhagwaticharan Varma, Hazariprasad Dwivedi, Ramdhari Sinha Dinkar, Nagarjuna, Upendranath Ashk, Agyeya, Vishnu Prabhakar, Bhavaniprasad Misra, Nagendra, Bhisham Sahni, Amritlal Nagar, Prabhakar Machwe and Bharat Bhushan Agarwal. In addition, it contains write-ups on novelist Tarasankar Bandyopadhyaya and the Malayalam poet G. Sankara kurup.

The unique feature of these interviews is that they are marked by a free-associational style and concentrate on the literary works of each author, penetrating the recesses of his creative mind. Outlining the procedure adopted for the interviews, Rangra says in his preface to the book that a basic questionnaire was provided to each author before the actual sitting with him, though supplementary questions were put in the course of the interview itself. Whether the interview was tape-recorded or the notes were taken by a steno, the typed script was shown to the author for authentication and for making such additions or alterations as he might consider necessary.

Some of the interviews may at first sight give an impression that the interviewer's general approach to the author and his writings is that of sympathy and reverence. But Rangra has clarified in his preface that he did not hesitate to put inconvenient questions to the authors, but he took care to ensure that the interviews did not end up in a session of mere argument-making or rationalisations at the conscious level, his main purpose being the exploration of the psyche and the creative processes of the writer.

This approach of Rangra has paid him dividends in many interviews which bring out unthought of revelations. Maithilisharan Gupta, for example, revealed in the course of his interview that the couplet 'Rama tum manav ho Ishwar nahin ho kya', quoted on the title page of Saket, did not form a part of the work and was composed much earlier in response to the comments of an Arya Samajist. Dinkar revealed that his poetic work Urvashi was originally designed to be a radio play, but after writing an act or two he realised that its potentialities could not be adequately handled in a radio play and gave it the form of conversational poetry (Samvad kavya). He further agreed with the interviewer that had this work been divided into cantos instead of being divided into plays, the author would have enjoyed greater freedom in expression. Jainendra admitted for the first time in one of his interviews that the contents of the prefaces to his earlier novels, such as Tyagapatra and Kalyani, were 'fictitious' and formed a part of his novels, and were intended to make the reader believe in the author's non-involvement in the story.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The depth of the interviews, however, varies from author to author, depending upon the intensity of his involvement in the interview and his rapport with the interviewer. While the interviews with Siyaramasharan Gupta, Sumitranandan Pant, Mahadevi Varma, Yashpal, Jainendra, Ilachandra Joshi, G.Sankara Kurup, Bhagwaticharan Varma, Bachchan, Hazariprasad Dwivedi, Dinkar, Agyeya and Nagarjun provide valuable insights into the subtleties of their creative mind and pave the way for the proper appreciation of their works, those with Vrindavan Lal Varma, Seth Govind Das, Ashk and Machwe are either sketchy or sound like academic debates. But collectively these interviews do evince a serious attempt on the part of the interviewer to link the reader's reactions to the workings of the author's mind and add a new dimension to this relatively new literary form. On the one hand these interviews touch the fringe of literary criticism, on the other they provide an insight into the psyche of the author. Thus, this book attempts to bridge the ever-widening gap between the critic and the writer, besides providing rare and useful material for the researchers.

Ja.C.J.

SAHNI, BHISHAM (Hindi; b. 1915) was born in Rawalpindi, now in Pakistan. He had his schooling at Gurukul Pothahar and D.A.V. School in Rawalpindi, graduated from Government College, Lahore, and received Master's degree in English from Punjab University in 1937. In 1958 he earned his Ph.d. degree from Punjab University, Chandigarh.

Sahni's close association with the Muslims since his childhood inculcated in him a secular approach to life and literature. He witnessed with great shock the communal riots that took place in Rawalpindi in the wake of Independence. The terrible upheaval and bloodshed left a deep imprint on him which found its expression in his famous novel Tamas (English tr. Kites Will Fly).

In 1942, Sahni joined the Congress when Gandhi launched the Quit India Movement, and later worked with the Relief Committee when the communal riots broke out in Rawalpindi in March 1947. Later he joined the Indian People's Theatre Association in Bombay, and worked as a performing artist under the guidance of Balraj Sahni, his elder brother. He directed the famous drama Bhoot Gari, adapted for the stage by Khwaja Ahmed Abbas. In 1950, he joined Delhi College as lecturer in English. He lived in Moscow from 1957 to 1963 and worked as a translator from Russian to Hindi with the Foreign Language Publishing House, Moscow.

Sahni started writing short stories at the age of 16. His first story 'Neeli ankhen' (The blue eyes) was published in the famous journal Hansa, then edited by Amrit Rai. He has so far written more than a hundred shrt stories which have been compiled in several volumes, such as Bhagya rekha (1953), Pahla paath (1956), Bhatakti raakh (1966), Patarian (1973), Vangchu (1978), Shobhyatra (1980), and Nishachar (1983). His short stories reveal a fine sense of craft. Some of them are reckoned among the best pieces in Hindi literature, such as 'Chief ki daawat' and 'Amritsar aa gaya hai'. Mention may also be made of 'Vangchu' and 'Lila Nandlal ki' for their technique and satire. Besides, he has written stories for children also, collected in the volume Gulal ka khel.

Tamas and Basanti are considered to be Sahni's best novels. Tamas depicts the communal riots of Punjab in a powerfully suggestive style, exposing the British policy of divide and rule and the opportunism of the big bourgeoise of all communities in Punjab. Tamas demonstrates beyond any shadow of doubt the plight of the common people who are worst affected in the disturbances. The progressive, secular, and national perspective of the writer is reflected in all his works in general, but it finds its best expression in Tamas. He has also written three plays: Fanoosh (1977), Kabira khara bazar mein (1981), and Madhuri (written in 1982). Out of these Fanoosh has been widely appreciated.

Bhisham Sahni has also written, in English, the biography of Balraj Sahni, the well-known writer and actor, under the title Balraj My Brother (1981). He has also written literary articles in Hindi and English on various topics of contemporary relevance.

Apart from being an outstanding writer in Hindi fiction and an experienced university teacher of English, Bhisham Sahni knows Sanskrit, Urdu, Punjabi and Russian. He has translated about 25 books from Russian into Hindi, including Tolstory's Resurrection. He also translated into English stories of Hindi writers, such as Yash Pal, Amarkant and Kamleshwar, and Punjabi writers like Nav Tej Singh and Gurudayal Singh.

Bhisham Sahni has been widely acclaimed as a novelist, short story writer and dramatist. He has received a number of awards for his excellence as a writer, such as the Shiromani Lakhak Award (1979), the Sahitya Akademi Award and the U.P. Government Award for Tamas (1976), the M.P. Kala Sahitya Parishad Award (1975) for his play Fanoosh, the Lotus Award from the Afro-Asian Writers' Association (1981), and the Soviet Land Nehru Award (1983).

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Raj. S.

SAHOO, KRUSHNA CHARAN (Oriya; b.1929), teacher and scholar of Oriya literature, is widely known for his scholarly work on the Ramayana tradition in Orissa and for showing new traits in medieval Oriya literature. He has read Oriya literature quite extensively and also medieval Indian literature, particularly Hindi, Bengali and Assamese. His knowledge of Sanskrit classics is also profound. As critic, he has concentrated mostly on ancient and medieval Oriya literature and has contributed a number of articles to journals in English, Hindi and Oriya. He has five books of criticism and thirteen edited works to his credit.

As critic, Sahoo is original and has exerted a great influence on his age. His emphasis is not on adherence of classical rules or on tracing the influence of the classics on a particular writer, but on the analysis of a text and in bringing out its literary graces, besides showing the impact of society and culture on it. As a writer with a socialistic vision, he concentrates on the interaction between tradition and culture. His work as an editor of the palm leaf manuscripts also deserves special mention.

Sahoo's critical works can be broadly divided into two divisions. One is the study of ancient and medieval texts in Oriya, and the other the editing of manuscripts with scholarly introductions to the relevant texts. The works belonging to the first group are Literature and Social Life in Medieval Orissa (1971), Kahe Krushna Das kabi (1975), Prachina sahitya (1982), Madhyakalina sahitya (1983) and Kabi Balaram Das (1988). The works which can be assigned to the second group are Dharma gita (1977), Uddhaba gita (1977), Charikhani (1978), Rudrasudhanidhi (1978), Sri Jagannath lilamruta (1978), Srimadbhagvat Gita (1978), Rasa panchadhyayi (1981), Parimala (1982), Gobinda Chandra (1985), Brahmanda bhugola (1985), as also the Mahabharata (1978), Chandi purana (1985) and Jagmohan Ramayana (1980) edited by him.

Literature and Social Life in Medieval Orissa is in English, consisting of eleven papers out of which one is on the Oriya dialect spoken in the Singhbhum district of Bihar and the others on the 15th and 16th century Orissa, particularly the social life of this period as portrayed in the two Oriya epics, the Mahabharata and Jagamohan Ramayana. In his literary criticism, such as Prachina sahitya and Madhyakalina sahitya, he gives more attention to the presentation of contemporary social life. Thus, his studies on Sarala Das, the Panchasakha writings and Upendra Bhanj, exhibit a mine of information on Oriya society, culture and religion.

Rasakallola, a famous 18th century kavya by Dinakrushna Das, has been assessed by him in a different perspective in Kahe Krushna Das kabi. The work tries to identify the writer and his place in the 18th century Oriya as well as the medieval poetic tradition. Prachina sahitya and Madhyakalina sahitya are respectively collections of 19 and 18 papers. While in the former he convicingly argues the date of compositon of some controversial texts like Sisuveda, Amarakosha and Saptanga, in the latter the discussion is fixed solely on the contemporary socio-cultural and religious conditions, motivating the medieval poet. For the first time in Oriya criticism Sahoo has traced the influence of Islam and Sufism also on the medieval Oriya poets.

In most of his edited works Sahoo provides long introductions to the texts. While assigning the text to a particular period, he collects the views of earlier scholars. In the introduction to Rudrasudhanidhi, a 16th century text, he has concentrated on style and social ethos.

In his introduction to Rasa panchadhyayi his emphasis is on the art of editing. The long introduction to Sarala Mahabharata gives a detailed account of the differences between the Oriya Mahabharata and its original Sanskrit, and in the introduction to Jagamohan Ramayana he projects the epic as a comprehensive social document. He considers the characters of the two epics Mahabharata and Ramayana in Oriya as the genuine products of a common humanity, unmodified by the customs of a particular place.

Sahoo's criticism and edited works are original. He avoids a slavish application of the rules of the classics. He never forgets to discuss the language used in a text and sometimes takes the difficult and tiresome task of counting the number of times a particular word is used in a text as in Kahe Krushna Das kabi. According to him, such usage is not a mere repetition, it shows the poet's imagination at work. He is distrustful of a critic who, without entering the sense and the soul of an author, follows a few general rules or prescribes a theoretical design while writing about him.

P.C.P.

SAHOO, MOHAPATRA NILAMANI (Oriya; b. 1926), an outstanding figure in modern Oriya fiction, was born at

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Niali in district Cuttack and did his M.A. in Oriya from Utkal University. He has taught Oriya literature in various government colleges in Orissa.

A prolific writer, he has to his credit 19 short-story collections, 2 novels, and 10 collections of essays. All his writings are marked by a rare blend of wit and pathos. His short stories are unique, both for their emotional appeal and for their distinct vision of life. He has experimented with a wide range of styles and techniques, and has also contributedd to literary criticism and journalism.

His short-story collection, Abhisapta Gandharba (1981), won him the prestigious Sarala Award as well as the Sahitya Akademi Award (1984). The stories in this collection are thinly veiled autobiographical pieces evoking, with a sense of nostalgia and his characteristic humour, the intense world of his childhood.

He has also received other literary awards including the state Sahitya Academy award and the B.C. Nayak literary award.

He has edited a number of literary journals, including Jhankara, Utkal prasang, Orissa review and Vivekanandanka vani o rachana. He has also been closely associated with a number of literary, cultural and spiritual organisations and is the Vice-President of the New Life Education Trust, Orissa.

Some of his other significant short story collections are Ranu apa tharu Pussy paryanta (1966), Anya rupa rupantara (1977), Pingala se anya jane (1977) and Sekala pakhala (1978). Dhara and dhara (1961) and Tamasi Radha (1964) are his two novels, and Kichhi sutra kinchit byakhya (1976), Dhwani dhwani pratidhwani (1977) and Devadasara dristipata are his collections of essays.

Y.M.

SAHRIDAYA (Sanskrit) is a term used in Sanskrit poetics. It means 'a sympathetic connoisseur of literature, whose heart (sensibility) equals the poet's. A trained and cultivated mind with sharp intellect is essential for the proper appreciation of poetry. Anandavardhana explains the term thus:

> Yesham kavyanushilanabhyasavashad vishadibhute
> Manomukure varnaniya-tanmayibhavanyogyata > tatra hridayasamvadabhajah sahridayah.

(A sahridaya is one whose mind becomes as transparent as a mirror due to regular practice and study of literature, acquiring the ability of being riveted to the subject.)

The process of literary appreciation involves three factors—poet, poetic creation and appreciative reader. By his deep insight, the poet discovers the essence of truth and beauty hidden in nature and human life. Then he gives shape and form to his feelings in a piece of composition, choosing appropriate words and phrases. Irrespective of its nature, size or genre, a literary work must be imbued with meaning which a sahridaya should grasp and enjoy. So, a genuine literary work is one that acts as a link between the poet and the appreciator. Perhaps, this is why it is called 'sahitya'—it establishes 'sahitattva' (relationship) between the poet, the character, and the reader.

The definition of sahridaya occurs in the texts of Vamana and Anandavardhana. A sahridaya is a man of taste: he combines in him the qualities of a critic and a connoisseur. He is well-read, discerning and initiated in the intricacies of theoretic principles. At the same time he has the capacity for aesthetic enjoyment. Though the poet is a creator, the ultimate test of poetry demands the appreciation of a sahridaya.

Rasa is not only an objective entity which resides in the description or in the characters of a literary work, but it is also a subjective condition realised by the reader's own capacity for aesthetic enjoyment. So, a degree of culture, experience and aesthetic instinct is demanded of the critic, who is a 'rasika' or 'sahridaya'. Sometimes the term 'suchetas' appears as a synonym of the term sahridaya in various alamkara texts. The concept of sahridaya is a desideratum for the proper appreciation of any kind of literature, and the success and satisfaction of the poet depends on him.

D.N.C.

SAIFUL MALUK (Punjabi) is a well-known verse-composition of romance and adventure by Mian Mohammad Bakhsh, written in the tradition of Qissa-poetry in Punjabi. Saiful Maluk was first published in Persian script in 1941, and then in Gurumukhi script in 1961 by the Languages Department, Punjab, Patiala. The Qissa, which inter-alia deals with important questions of art and poetics, was originally written in Persian and four manuscripts of the same are kept in the British Museum. These four Mss. are titled: Qissa Saif-ul-Maluk, Qissa Gulba Sanaubar, Qissa hazar gaisu and King of Egypt and Abridged Qissa Saif-ul-Maluk (incomplete). Though these four Qissas resemble one another, there is vital difference in the plot of each composition. The internal evidences show that the four manuscripts at the British Museum belong to the 17th century. However, Mian Mohammad Bakhsh wrote it in the Punjabi language in 1863-64, though the script remained in Persian characters. That was the age of Qissa-writing in Punjabi and Mian Mohammad Bakhsh's Qissa fulfilled an important need of the day. It is very difficult to say whether the Qissa was earlier written in any other Indian language, but it is certain that Mian Mohammad Bakhsh was the first to write it in Punjabi, and the Qissa was extremely popular among the people. Two printed copies of the Qissa, which are available, refer to two separate editions. The first edition is published by Sheikh Ghulam Hussain and Sons, Tazran Kutub, Bazar Kashmiri, Lahore, and the second edition is published by Seth Adamji Abdullah of Bombay from Naulakha Bazar, Lahore. Yet another Qissa in Punjabi by Mian Lutf Ali Sahib Bahawalpuri, entitled The Strange Qissa of Saif-ul-Maluk Kilm, published by J.S. Sant Singh and Sons (year of publication not mentioned) is available. Though the plots of both the Qissas resemble each other, the one by Bahawalpuri is shorter in size and poor in literary merits than the one by Mian Mohammad Bakhsh. After Independence in 1947, the need to transliterate the Qissa into Gurumukhi script was felt, as it became difficult to read and understand Punjabi in the Persian script on the other side of Punjab in India. Consequently, Qissa Saiful Maluk was edited by Santokh Singh Razi and transliterated into Gurumukhi script by Diwan Singh and was published by the Director General, Languages Department, Punjab, Patiala, 1961.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Saiful Maluk is a wonderful story of love, romance, adventure, mystery, etc. and its plot is based on a tale from the Arabian Nights, called 'The Story of Saif-ul-Maluk and Badi Jamal'. Aasim, the emperor of Egypt, who did not have any issue till his old age of 62, was assured by the royal astrologers of the birth of a son if he married the daughter of Jamshed, a rich Chieftain. Nine months after the marriage, he was blessed with a son, who was christened Saif-ul-Maluk. When the prince was 14, his father presented him two ancestral royal coins inscribed with his own (the prince's) picture on one and that of Badi Jamal on the other. No sooner did the prince see the picture of Badi Jamal than he started behaving like a lover gone mad. When all efforts to trace the young lady failed, the prince insisted upon going in search of Badi Jamal. The emperor was persuaded to allow the prince to undertake the dangerous journey in the company of his best friend Saeed and many attendants. The sea-journey was arduous and on their way to Istambul, their ships were caught in storms and gales of the worst kind. Somehow, through the journey Saeed and some men got separated from the prince. They suffered damages and losses of all kinds while passing through India and Tibet, but Saiful Maluk and his associates did not lose heart. At one stage, they were involved in a fierce battle and the prince was taken prisoner. The daughter of the chief warrior of the enemy's camp took fancy to Saiful Maluk, but he, unaffected by the gesture, proceeded on his journey. The stage came when out of dejection and frustration, the prince thought of committing suicide; a series of supernatural events took place and the prince reached the fort of the demon-god Afshand Baish where the princess Khatoom was a prisoner. Saiful Maluk freed her, they escaped from the fort and finally reached the city where Badi Jamal's uncle was the ruler. Jamal's father was called from Saran island and he took them to an island where for some time they lived in peace. However, this union was short-lived as the prince was kidnapped by the demon king Behram, who threw him in a well full of snakes and scorpions. But Jamal's father Shahpal came to his rescue after fighting a pitched battle with Behram. Finally, with all the grandeur, the royal wedding of Saif and Jamal took place which was attended by the emperor Aasim, too. On returning to Egypt, Saiful Maluk ascended the throne after the death of his father and ruled for about fifty years.

In terms of size, Qissa Saiful Maluk is the longest one having 9128 couplets. It can be termed a 'masnavi' in form as it is written in couplets and not in stanzas. In addition to being very rich in evoking a fairy-tale environment on the pattern of imaginary tales of love, romance and adventure of the Arabian Nights, this Qissa is a rare specimen of hidden wealth of knowledge about many aspects of life. Apart from that, it is a complete reference book on poetics too, as Mian Mohammad Bakhsh has devoted enough space to the basic questions of creative art and literary criticism. The Qissa is, therefore, a great contribution to the Punjabi Qissa literature, which is both a separate traditon and a separate genre now.

G.S.

SAIKIA, BHABENDRANATH (Assamese; b.1932), prominent short story writer and playwright, winner of the Assam Prakashan Award (1973) and the Sahitya Akademi Award (1976), is known for his realistic portrayal of life, human interest, keen observation and lucid expression. It is these qualities which enabled him to enliven even an ordinary situation in day-to-day life. Saikia has deep understanding of the Assamese village life and he portrays it with sympathy. He describes a situation in a detached way and tells a story in a convincing tone. The most engaging thing about him is his capacity to make everything interesting and expressive. Although he follows almost the same pattern in most of his stories, sometimes a touch of irony enriches the pattern and produces striking effects. Saikia's collections of stories are Prahari (1963), Brindavan gahvar (1969), Sendur (1970), Bhabendranath

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Saikiar srestha galpa (1973) and Sringkhal (1975). The two collections which brought him the Sahitya Akademi Award and the Assam Prakashan Parisad Award are Shringkhal and Sendur respectively. Saikia has left an equally impressive mark on the Assamese drama for his intimate knowledge of the stage and the capacity for an acute observation. He is one of those dramatists who have made significant contribution to the development of the one-Act and Radio plays in Assamese. He has also directed a number of plays and films successfully.

Saikia has a doctorate in Physics and has been a teacher at Gauhati University. He has also worked as secretary, Text Books Production, Gauhati University for a number of years, and is at present, engaged mainly in directing plays and films. He is now considered one of the best film directors in the country.

S.B.

SAIKIA, CHANDRAPRASAD (Assamese; b. 1926) was born in Amguri, district Sibsagsr, and has earned for himself a niche in Assamese literature as a writer of short stories and novels. He received his early education at his native place, and later graduated from Cotton College, Gauhati. While he was yet a student at the Secondary School, he took part in the Quit India movement and was kept behind the bars for some months. Having taken a post-graduate degree in English from Calcutta University, he worked as a journalist for a few years and edited the Asam batori (Assam news), a daily newspaper, in the early sixties. He also edited a few literary magazines during the last twenty years, and is now serving as Secretary to the Publication Board, Assam.

Saikia has so far published half a dozen novels of which Mandakrantha (1960), Meghamallar (1962), Uttar-akal and Janmantar (1970) are noteworthy. He first made his impact on Assamese literature with his novelette Edin, based on the experience of a day. First published in a magazine, the work came out in the book form in the late fifties. Saikia's three early novels dealt exclusively with the individual's hopes, aspirations, love and frustration, but later he turned towards social problems in their relationship to individuals. Saikia appears to have chosen his words and expressions carefuly in order to make his writings a pleasant reading. He has also written a number of short stories which are marked by neatness of execution and carefully worked-out plots involving persons from the middle class the author himself belongs to. He has so far published two collections of short stories, Mayamriga and Nachpati phul.

S.S.

SAIKIA, NAGEN (Assamese; b. 1941) is comparatively a younger writer who has established himself as a critic and short story writer of our times. Son of Umaram Saikia of village Hatiakhowa in the district of Sibsagar, Nagen (or, Nagendra) did his B.A. from Devraj College, Golaghat, and M.A. in Assamese from Gauhati University. Having served three colleges as lecturer in Assamese, he joined Dibrugarh University in 1972 and has been working there since. Saikia, besides being a man of letters, is interested in cultural activities. He has served the Asam Sahitya Sabha, the premier literary institution of Assam, first as Assistant Secretary and later as General Secretary.

Saikia has edited and published a large number of books, booklets, and centenary and felicitation volumes in Assamese. He is also associated with the editing of a few literary magazines. He is the author of five collections of short stories, viz. Kuber Hatibarua (1967), Chabi aru Frame (1969), Bandha kothat dhumuha (Tempest in a tea pot, 1971), Matir chakir jui (The flame of an earthen light, 1973) and Astitvar sikali (The chain of existence, 1976). He is not a conventional story writer and, therefore, his stories, presented intellectually, sometimes project characters, sometimes probe the workings of the mind and sometimes focus on some situation or problem. The technique of the internal dialogue has considerably influenced his style of presentation. He has also brought out two collections of essays, Chinta aru charcha (Reflections and thought, 1977) and Saundaryadarshan (Essays on aesthetics).

S.S.

SAINDHAYAKA (Sanskrit/Prakrit/Apabhramsha). The term has varied connotations. (1) It may imply one of the ten 'lasyangas' (Limbs of soft dance) used in Sanskrit drama, particularly Bhana, or a compassionate song in Saindhava (Sindhi) Prakrit composed in long syllables (presumbly to create an effect of slow movement, heavy with grief), sung to the accompaniment of music by a lady whose lover has failed to keep the tryst.

(2) It may connote an ancient dialect of Apabhramsha around Sindh. Dombika, Prasthana, etc., among the forms of the Upa-rupakas, were usually composed in this dialect. A famous example of the Rasakanka type, Radha-vipralambha by Bhejjala, surviving now in quotations only, is said to have profusion of this dialect.

(3) It may imply a minor type of play in the Saindhava dialect, as defined by Kohala.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.K. Warder Indian kavya Literature, Vol. I; V. Raghavan, Bhoja's Shringar-prakasha; Sahitya darpana, VI; Natakalakshana ratnakosha.

R.N.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

SAIYIDAIN, KHWAJA GHULAM-US (Urdu; b. 1904, d. 1971) was a great educationist and prominent prose writer. He was born in Panipat (Haryana). He graduated from the Aligarh Muslim University in 1921 and, later, did his M.Ed. from Leeds University (U.K.). He received the degree of D.Litt. (honoris causa) from the Muslim University in 1962.

Saiyidain's father was an eminent scholar and a well-known writer in Urdu. The famous poet-critic, Maulana Altaf Husain Hali was Saiyidain's maternal grandfather. Saiyidain specialised in educational philosophy, principles and psychology of education and had special experience in the field of teachers' education. He also worked on Educational Administration and Education for International Understanding. He had full command of the English language and equal mastery over Persian. He also knew to a certain extent the Arabic and French languages.

Saiyidain started his career as Principal, Training College and Professor of Education at Aligarh Muslim University (1926-38). Subsequently, he had had many tenures at different reputable centres of education, and during such tenures, he attended many international conferences on education. He has to his credit a number of books on subjects concerning education and its systems. The literary works to his credit are Rooh-e-tahzeeb (1943), Andhi men chiragh, which was picked up for Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1963, Mujhe kahna hai kuchh apni zaban men, autobiography edited and supplemented by his sister Saliha Abid Husain, Sukhan-e-dilnawaz, selected letters in Urdu written to friends and members of his family, edited by Sughra Mehdi. His literary works in English are: Man in the New World (1964) and Islam: The Religion of Peace (1969).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.A. Suroor (ed.), Urdu Adab, special issue on K.G. Saiyidain; Malik Ram (ed.), Special numbers of Tehreer (1973) and Tazkira-e-Muasirin, on K.G. Saiyidain; S. Abid Husain (ed.) Commemoration Volume presented to K.G. Saiyidain (1964).

N.A.F.

SAJJAD HUSSAIN, MUNSHI (Urdu; b.1856, d.1915), eminent Urdu prose writer, journalist and humorist, was born in a respectable family. His father, Munshi Mansur Ali, was a Deputy Collector, who, later, served as Civil Judge in Hyderabad State. Sajjad Hussain studied at Canning College, Lucknow, from where he obtained Entrance Examination Certificate. After serving several short term jobs, he started from Lucknow in 1877 his own Urdu journal, Awadh punch, which gave a fillip to humorous writings. This was probably the first journal dealing with humour in Urdu, and it followed the pattern of the Punch, London. This journal inspired many other such ventures in Urdu in various states. The Awadh punch followed a nationalist policy and severely criticised the British government policies in a humorous, and sometimes satirical vein. It also caricatured feudal elements and the blind imitators of the west. The journal also championed the cause of Hindu-Muslim unity.

Sajjad Hussain was also an eminent novelist in his own right. In his works, he combined humour with fiction. His novels include Haji baghlol, Tarahdar londi. Pyari duniya, Ahmaqulzin, Mithi chhuri, Kaya palat, Hyat-i-Sheikh Chilli. These novels inculcated new social values and advocated modernisation of the outlook and behaviour in view of the changing socio-economic realities.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Furqat Kakorvi, Tanz-o-mazah (Lucknow, 1964); Rashid Ahamad Siddiqi, Tanziyat-o-mazhakat (Allahabad, 1945); Wazir Agha, Urdu adab men tanz-o-mazah (Lahore, 1956).

M.H.

SAKARIYA, BADRIPRASAD (Rajasthani; b. 1896, d?) was born at Balotara-Badmer in the erstwhile state of Jodhpur. He devoted his entire life to the study and editing of old texts with the sole purpose of preparing a lexicon, which he did. This prestigious publication was brought out by a Jaipur based publisher in three parts, of which the first one appeared in 1977 and the other two soon after. This lexicon, Rajasthani-Hindi shabda kosha, has been highly spoken of by critics. It also contains a good number of spoken words in the author's own dialect. Sakariya was also associated with the editing of Rajasthan bharati, a research journal. He took up this responsibility on joining the Sadul Rajasthani Research Institute at Bikaner. He brought out some special issues of the journal on L.P.Tessitori, Prithviraj Rathore and Maharana Kumbha, which were highly acclaimed. His edition of Muhata Nainasi ri khyat (4 parts) also brought him much reputation. This book was published by the Rajasthan State Oriental Institute, Jodhpur, during the years 1960-1967. Among the other books edited by him Hariras deserves particular mention. He was honoured by several institutes in the form of prizes and medals. The Rajasthani Bhasha, Sahitya evam Sanskriti Akademi (Bikaner) honoured him as a scholar of distinction. His whole life has been a life of complete dedication to Rajasthani literature.

S.N.J.

SAKET (Hindi) by Maithilisharan Gupta is one of the best known epics in modern Hindi poetry. It followed Bharat Bharati, and the poet considered it one of his favourite works. At the instance of Rabindranath Tagore, Acharya Mahavir Prasad Dwivedi had written an article, pointing out the indifference of Hindi poets towards the character of Urmila, which impelled Guptaji to make her the focal point of his epic. The poet gave more than a decade to the composition of the epic—a saga of poetic endeavour, indeed.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The plot of Saket is based on 'Rama katha', primarily as found in Tulsi's Ramacharitmanas, though the poet has given the story a new orientation. It begins with a piece of conversation between Lakshman and Urmila about the installation of Rama as yuvraj (heir apparent). The news disturbs Manthara, Kaikeyi's maid, who regards the installation of Rama as an act of conspiracy against Bharata who is away at his mother's parental home. She instigates Kaikeyi, Bharata's mother, who begins pondering over the words of Manthara:

Bharat se sut per bhi sandeh,
Bulaya tak na use jo geha

(The integrity of a son like Bharata is questioned, who was not even called back home.)

Maithilisharan thus offers a psychological reason for Kaikeyi's action. Rama and Sita, along with Lakshman go into exile. Urmila is faced with a great dilemma—whether she should accompany her husband in exile or stay back at Ayodhya. She gets over her dilemma and is prepared for personal suffering rather than bar her husband from doing his duty towards Rama and Sita. The primary aim of the poet is to exalt the character of Urmila and highlight her 'tragedy', her quiet suffering, her loneliness, and her personal sacrifice. The locale of the poem is thus Saket since it is here that the heroine lives. Only once does the poet move out of Saket when he goes to Chitrakut, but that too in the company of a cross-section of the Saket society.

The poet's contribution to the Ramayana theme lies in his presentation of the Rama story from an altogether different angle so that, instead of Sita, Urmila becomes the focal point of the epic. The pangs of separation suffered by Urmila and described at length with a touching effect constitute a major part of the poem. It is interesting to note that though written in the age of Chhayavad, Saket represents the classical tradition.In an age of doubts and uncertainties, the voice of the poet remains the voice of faith—serene and steady. In the fret and fever and garishness of life, the poet stands calm and firm, full of noble sentiments. Consciously or unconsciously, he subscribes to the classical view that love, though a great ideal, is an inferior value which must yield place to duty.

A national poet, Maithilisharan Gupta was a representative of Indian culture and his Saket enshrines the ideals of our heritage. As an epic, it is a work of consummate art. The dramatic presentation of the story, the art of narration, the delineation of characters, the psychological probings of human mind, the depth and range of feelings—in every area the poet excels. The ninth chapter, in particular, marks the excellence of his craft where his imagination is kindled by every manifestation of natural beauty and sweetness. The dominant rasa in the poem is 'Vipralambha shringara', but the other rasas have not been neglected either. The language of the epic is refined Khariboli as against the Awadhi of Priya pravas, another great epic of the age written by Hariaudh. When published, Saket cast its spell on its readers by the power of its story and the quality of its artistic achievement.

S.D.M.

SAKHARAM BINDER (Marathi), written and first performed in 1972, won prompt critical acclaim for its author, Vijay Tendulkar. Though the play was criticised for excessive use of sex and violence, it was, in fact, not just a matter of superficial innovation, but a candid experiment espousing a certain freedom in man-woman relationship. The heated controversy which the performance aroused is a clear indication of Tendulkar's unconventional attitude to human relationships and problems. The author himself finds in it a correspondence with Artaud's concept of 'Theatre of cruelty'.

The play Sakharam Binder has a simple narrative outline, involving the relationship between Sakharam, a binder by profession, and two women Lakshmi and Champa who enter his life. The interest of the reader is not so much in the dramatic action as in the subtle workings of the heart, the gripping portrayal of violence and cruelty as opposed to passive suffering.

Tendulkar stands on a platform different from that of other contemporary Marathi playwrights because of his innovative style in presenting a variety of themes. By choosing a low class, crude womaniser like Sakharam Binder as the central character of the play, he has not only drastically changed the framework of Marathi drama but also the delineation of life at the core. Sakharam Binder is extremely blunt in its portrayal of existentialist tendencies. A domineering character, Sakharam has no moral or social taboo. He indulges in drinking and womanising, with no trace of guilt whatsover; he even makes hearty digs at the puritan hypocrisy which governs the prevalent code of ethics. And yet, behind his overtures one finds in him a streak of flexible commonsense morality which at times is pleasantly surprising, being wholly unexpected in his case.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Sakharam Binder shows Tendulkar at his best in characterisation. Sakharam, Champa and Lakshmi are neither stock characters nor schematic types, each of them is a basically powerful illustration of the dramatist's astounding creativity. Sakharam's ego tries to manifest itself in a challenging, rather menacing, way unwilling to be tied down to anything. The influence of Lakshmi triggers off an inner conflict in him - a conflict between the existential ego and the metaphysical "I", reducing Sakharam to a pitiable condition. Instead of dominating the situation, he finds himself dominated by it. Untamed by sophistication of any kind, the characters in the play speak a language which is not just obscene but also shockingly vulgar. It is seasoned with a liberal use of abuses, casually thrown in. Lakshmi, an exteme image of darkness and death, is exploited sexually and then thrown out mercilessly. She does return, however, and makes a bid for power through religious rituals, calculated compassion and well-designed intrigues. She emerges as one of the champion life-haters in the drama. There is also a rich interplay of ambiguity about her. Champa, again, has a lust for life which has the fullness of rich sap. A curious blend of lewdness and sentimentality, her disintegration comes as a natural fall out.

The play succeeds because it is able to make certain statements about life which have a universal appeal. It brings about the confrontation between the forces represented by Lakshmi on the one hand and Sakharam and Champa on the other. The final result is a stupefied mind that has lost its protective shell of non-traditional, and hence rebelling, values. The play which came as a shock with its ethical violations faced a ban on its performance which was, however challenged in the court of law.

The play has been translated into several Indian and foreign languages and staged in four of them.

A.De.

SAKHI (Rajasthani), derived from the Sanskrit word 'Sakshin', has been freely used by the medieval saints, and it were they who gave the term a specific meaning. It was in devotional poetry that the saints expressed the truth experienced by them and wrote about their self-realisation and their values and ideals. They used the 'Padas', 'Dohas' and other metres in their poems which have been usually called sakhis, considered the most intimate compositions of the saints. In course of time some saints began adding to or altering the sakhis of the famous saints of the past with a view to lending an authority to their own sayings. They quoted the sayings of Kabir, Dadu, Ramcharan, etc., who were either the pioneers of their own sects or were held in high esteem by the common people, in order to reinforce their own preachings.

Sakhis have been regarded as a fountain source of wisdom. As they have been mainly written in doha, many critics regard sakhi and doha as identical. In Rajasthani, the sakhis of Jambhoji and Jasnathji have a different form. They are usually verses with rhymed terminations. In addition, a sort of rhythmic prose marks the sakhis of Jambhoji. The saints, following his tradition, have written two types of sakhis—those which use metres made up of three lines each, and those which are in a collective form of several lines with rhymed terminations. The first type is called 'chhandan ki' (metrical sayings), while the second is known as 'kanan ki'. 'Kanan' here means an aggregate of the particles of wisdom. The sayings of the saints in the tradition of Jasnathji are known as 'Sabad'. All other schools of Rajasthani saints have their sakhis or vanis in dohas and padas set to music.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hazariprasad Dwivedi, Kabir (Bombay, 1947); H.L. Maheshwari, History of Rajasthani Literature (New Delhi, 1980).

Hi.M.

SAKKARI BALACHARYA (Kannada; b.1856, d.1920) was born in Saketanahalli of Koda Taluk in Dharwar district. He belonged to an orthodox Vaishnava family, and his pen name was Santa Kavi.

Sakkari Balacharya had his education in Sanskrit at home. He received good training in Kannada and Sanskrit, and was trained at the Teachers Training College, Dharwar. Having secured the post of a teacher, he continued in the same profession for nearly forty years.

Balacharya strived to secure for Kannada a respectful place in the northern part of Karnataka. He founded the Karnataka Dramatic Company, wrote several plays and staged them too. His first play Ushaharana was staged in several centres and became very popular. Even the non-Kannada speakers developed a liking for the play. This induced him to write several more plays like Siriyala satvaparikshe, Kichaka vadhe, Sundopasunda, Vatsalaharana, Virata parva, Surathasudhanava kalaga, Sitaranya pravesha and Chandravalicharita.

Sakkari Balacharya was a great composer of kirtanas. He was convinced that kirtanas served the cause of the propagation of language and literature. 'Mukundadanamrita', 'Ravana-Vedavati', 'Shrimati svayamvara', 'Hari-mitropakhyana', 'Syamantakopakhyana', 'Gajendramoksha' are some of his kirtanas. Of these, it was 'Mukundadanamrita' which brought him name and fame.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Balacharya's contribution to literature is significant. He wrote: 'With the intent of resurrecting the Kannada language, I have authored sixty-three works.' Kichakavadhe, Parvatipranaya, Meghaduta, Ritusamhara, Shakuntala and Mricchakatika are his translations, while Sitaranya pravesha and Harishchandrasatvapariksha are his works drawing on mythology. He has written some humorous essays like Addakathegala bukku, Kannada dasayyanapadagalu, Kannadigarige savalugalu, Vyabhicharanarthasindhu, Vasappanayakana pharsu, Kalamahime, Kalasura, etc. It is also said that he has written a few works like Shringarasagara, Virahataranga, Shringarapada sangraha, Rasika vichara, etc. which have a bearing on the erotic sentiment.

Balacharya had a deep love for Kannada language. His statement in his foreword to Mukundadanamrita runs as follows:

> A man aspires for humanity in this universe. But how could that be achieved? With a lot of effort alone it can be realised. Oh Kannadiga, there is an easy solution which is acceptable to every one. Do you know that? Love and devotion to the mother tongue is the way out. If one can imbibe love of language, human upliftment would be complete.

Balacharya sang of the history of Sri Vidyaranya, founder of Vijayanagar, in the form of kirtanas and songs. This work entitled Vidyaranya vijaya became very popular in Karnataka This poem also reveals Balacharya's patriotism and love of language. The lines 'Rakshishu Karnataka devi' (Protect us oh, mother diety of Karnataka), written in praise of the diety of Karnataka (Karnataka Bhudevi Stavana) occurring in the beginning of his Vidyaranya vijaya are significant in this regard.

Balacharya went from door to door, collecting contributions for organising the literary conference at Dharwar in 1918. At Belgaum and Dharwar the people of Karnataka honoured him for his great service to the country and the language.

N.Ba.

SAKSHI (Telugu) is a series of 140 essays written by Panuganti Lakshminarasimharao, which appeared in the first four decades of the twentieth century when the Indian society was in a state of change in the wake of the struggle of independence from British domination. Revolutionary social movements challenged the old values of life. Literary movements were launched to bring about changes in style, theme and language. The influence of the western civilisation and culture was felt in the fashions and manners of the people. The influence of English language and literature especially impelled the Telugu writers to seek new ways of expression. Holding up a mirror to the society of their time, the Sakshi essays were modelled after Addison's Spectator essays. Their main object was to expose the evils in society, reform the tastes of the people and to appeal to them to cultivate the spirit of self-criticism in the best interests of individual welfare and social regeneration.

Panuganti did not condemn the traditions downright nor welcome everything modern and western in the name of progress. He did not hesitate to raise his strong voice against the evil customs and warned the people not to lose their spiritual and moral moorings by anglicising themselves. He fought against evil but never attacked individuals. Criticism, caustic or gentle, was employed to reform individuals and society and to make them lead a better life.

Kalacharyulu, Gangahalasastry, Vani Dasudu, Borrayya Setti and Sakshi comprise the Sakshi Sangham. They discussed all subjects, serious and light, ranging from snuff, cock-fights, puppet shows to Govindanamams and Vedanta.

In his essays, though Panuganti advocated freedom of women from age-old customs and traditions and the necessity of affording them facilities for education and opportunities for employment, he cautioned them against blind imitation of western ways of life. He condemned child-marriages and supported widow-remarriages.

Panuganti respected the Vedic rules in spirit and not in letter. He supported Advaita and a life of simple living and high thinking. He condemned superstitions and mechanical observance of rituals and show in religion. He exhorted the people to lead a righteous life and not to believe that pilgrimages would rid them of evil. He deplored the futile controversies between the Shaivites and Vaishnavites. He appealed to the people to have acquaintance with Sanskrit language and the Upanishads.

Panuganti criticised those who were enamoured of western civilisation, western mode of dress and English education. He condemned downright those who disrespected their mother tongue. He believed that one should learn foreign languages to improve one's mother tongue and not to belittle it or forget it. He admired Mahatma Gandhi and supported the National Movement but exposed the weaknesses of the Khadi-clad people.

Panuganti exposed the defects of the Telugu dramas and the stage. He disliked the unnecessary introduction of poems and songs in the Telugu plays. As a dramatist he pleaded for a judicious blending of songs and poetry in dramatic dialogue. He supported the writing of tragedies forbidden by the old Indian drama critics. Though he criticised those who supported old poetry alone, he did not give unqualified support to modern poetry. He ridiculed Bhavakavita for its artificiality and Ashukavita for its superficiality.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Panuganti was the father of the modern Telugu essay. Though his style is literary, it approximates to the spoken tongue. His arguments, abounding in illustrations, are clear, direct, logical and forceful. He resorts to alliteration as an embellishment. His compound words lend stateliness and weight to his style. Robust commonsense reinforces his scholarship. Incisive wit, scintillating humour and caustic satire are Panuganti's weapons. His free and torrential flow of words to suit the occasion invigorates the theme. The Sakshi essays occupy a pride of place in Telugu literature for their inimitable humour, satire and style.

G.S.R.

SALABEGA (Oriya; 16th-17th c.), or Salbeg, was by birth a Pathan, but in conduct and practice a devout saint. He was a devotee of Lord Jagannath and is credited with the authorship of some of the most inspiring compositions on the Lord. His father was Subedar Jahangir Kuli Khan alias Lalbeg and his mother a Hindu widow of village Danda Mukundapur in the Puri district. Salabega lost his father early and his mother brought him up. Lalbeg was appointed Subedar in charge of Orissa by emperor Jahangir and was antagonistic towards the Hindu religious institutions. Perhaps, he was killed in a battle about 1608. Salabega was himself wounded in a fray about 1620-1622. At that time Mirza Ahmad Beg, Subedar of Orissa, was a tyrant at whose hands the Jagannath temple suffered damage.

Legend goes that once when Salabega fell ill his mother sought the blessings of Lord Jagannath, and Salabega dreamed that Krishna had come and sat by his side. Next morning he felt better and narrated the dream to his mother. This miraculous incident was a turning point in his life and he took to the life of a Vaishnavite sanyasi. After wandering far and wide he settled at Puri dedicating himself to the service of the Lord.

Salabega was a disciple of Jashovantadas and Shyamananda Goswami. His songs in praise of Lord Jagannath are unsurpassed in lyrical beauty and grace, and range from pathos to ecstasy. All these lyrics are immensely popular in Orissa and sung as bhajans. They are marked by simplicity of diction, and are singularly free from word play and ostentation.

The most popular and inspiring devotional lyric of Salabega is 'Ahe nila saila prabala matta barana' sung in a thousand voices in the Puri temple. Salabega's religion is love of man, beyond castes and creeds, and his lyrics achieve an extraordinary balance between human conduct and spiritual love.

G.M.

SALAI ILANTHIRAYAN (Tamil; b. 1930) is a noted poet, essayist and critic. Born in Salainainar Pallivasal, Tirunelveli district, he assumed the name of Salai Ilanthirayan and came to be known by that name in literary circles. He had his early education in Palayamkottai and moved over to Presidency College, Madras, where took his M.A. in Tamil literature (1954) and M.Litt (1956). His thesis for Ph.D. was on Tamil Proverbs and Society (1970).

Salai started as an Assistant Professor of Tamil in Presidency College, Madras. Later, he was Sub-editor in the Directorate of Advertising and Visual Publicity, Delhi. Then he joined Delhi University (1959) and became Reader (1972) and Head of Tamil Section (1979).

Salai began writing poems and essays from 1948. His first book of poems, Ilanthirayan kavitaikal, came out in 1962. He has now more than 35 books and four compilations to his credit. His literary innovation is his Urai veechu (Prose flashes), a new and powerful prose with lyrical touches.

He is founder-member of International Association for Tamil Research (1964), and All India University Tamil Teachers' Association (1968), and founder president of Rationalist Federation. Actively connected with the Delhi Tamil Sangam, he is one of the leaders of the Tamil Script Reform movement. He is fluent in Tamil and English.

Salai was awarded the Powell and Morehead Prize (1955) for his work Short Story in Tamil, and Bharathi Dasan Award by the Tamilnadu Government (1979) for his Puratchi muzhakkam. He is a member of Experts Committee of the Tamil University, Tanjore (1980).

Salai is a discriminating scholar. His outlook leans more towards the rationalistic than the atheistic side. His works—poetry, essays, criticism, travelogues and prose—bear testimony to his seasoned approach to men and letters.

S.Sr.

SALAM (Marathi) is a collection of forty-one poems by Mangesh Padgaonkar, poet and journalist. The subjects of these poems come straight from life as in 'Salam' (Salute),

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

'Ek zindabad kavita' (A song of triumph), 'Sanskriti' (Culture), 'Kumar Gandharva: lyachi samaj' (Kumar Gandharva: as I see him), 'Pratibaddha' (Commitment) and 'Politics'. Marked by delicate irony and firm perception of social and political realities, the book is a strong assertion of human dignity.

Salam echoes Padgaonkar's social and political commitment decrying encroachment on the individual liberty of the poet. The poet protests against power and establishment which trample upon human dignity and freedom, and launches an attack on politicians and bureaucrats for their apathy to the issues of social concern. Padgaonkar has no political affiliation, nor does he subscribe to any 'ism'; to him the poet's spirit of freedom and liberty of expression are the most precious things that matter.

The book won the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1980. It was also selected for the State Government Award which Padgaonkar declined in order to register his protest against what he thought was an 'undemocratic procedure of selection'.

The poems in this collection show Padgaonkar as a candid commentator of life as he sees it. Padgaonkar's characteristic empathy and a natural rhythm in expression make the poems striking miniatures. Giving his own comments on Salam, the poet says, "A true poet can never be a salesman of any ideology. His only commitment is to the truth of his experience. He does not thrust his views on his readers and respects their freedom of thought as much as his own. All that one can say about one's creation is 'this is my view of life, or this is how life can be seen'."

A.De.

SALDANHA, VINCENT JOSEPH PETER (Konkani; b.1928) was an eminent Konkani novelist, dramatist and journalist, born at Mangalore in a Roman Catholic Konkani family. He studied Sociology for his M.A. from Mysore University, and worked there for eight years. His first literary work was a Konkani play Bavanathlo gulab (Rose that does not fade, 1943). Since then he has written some forty-five excellent plays, including seven radio plays. Some of his popular plays are: Nirmonnem (Destiny), Rogtachi zodthi (Judgement of blood), Khaltiman (Surrender), Uloitat ulovndit (They speak, let them speak) and Sardaranchi signol (Sign of Sardars). The last one first appeared as a novel under the same title.

His greatest contribution to Konkani literature is his historical novel, Kanara bandhad (Captivity of Kanara Christians) in eight volumes, dealing with the plight of Christians under Tipu Sultan, ruler of Mysore from 1784 to 1799. He wrote these volumes from 1961 to 1975 and created a sensation in writing historical novels. He is a pioneer in this field. His first historical novel Devache kurpen (By the grace of God) has already seen three editions. His latest novel Saiba bhogos (Lord, forgive, 1979) is based on the history of the Goan ancestors of Kanara Christians.

Among his novels Tambdi bithul (Red fort, 1952) and Moga maka sikai (Teach me darling, 1971) are detective fiction; some of his other novels are based on religious, social and psychoanalytical themes. His language is polished, used by educated upper class people. He writes for people who can think and enjoy literature. His imagination is fantastic, re-creating historical scenes and characters with verve and vividness.

Besides fiction, his published works include Dampatya jeevana (Married life), a book on marriage and family life in Kannada and several translations from English religious books into Konkani.

Saldanha has written about 250 poems and some devotional songs too. He is an essayist and a short story writer as well. His literary articles have appeared in Konkani and Kannada journals. He was a founder-editor of Kannadavani a daily, which he edited for three years and a half. At present he is editor of Deepika Kannada, a bi-monthly, and a joint-editor of Amchi mai, a Konkani monthly. He is also a member of the editorial board of Raknno, a Konkani weekly. Five times winner of literary awards in Goa, and twice honoured in Mangalore by the Konkani Natak Sabha, and by Raknno, he was appointed editor of Amar Konkani, a research journal.

In all, Saldanha has published twenty books, and is still writing. His latest historical novel, Poorvaz pardeshant (Ancestors in foreign land), serialized in Raknno, has appeared in a book form.

M.V.

'SALI', RAMACHANDRA RAO (Kannada: b. 1889, d. 1978), novelist and poet, belonged to the earlier generation of modern poets. He worked as a school teacher in Dharwar, took part in the struggle for Independence and wrote poetry. Besides poetry, he wrote two or three novels and also some poems in Sanskrit.

Chitra srishti (1940) is the only collection of the poems of Sali, and the other book by him is his Kannada Ramayana (1934). Chitra srishti contains poems which are mainly lyrical and narrative. Lyric was a new genre when Sali had started writing, and it was difficult for him to come to grips with the new mode of expression. His lyrics deal with modern themes like patriotism, beauty of nature, and poverty. His favourite metre is shatpadi, a six-liner which was used in the epic poems of the middle ages. What is new in these poems is the unmistakable note of personal feeling and also a new perception couched in the old idiom of his poetry. The fall of leaves in winter, for example, reminds the poet of the feathers of the bird of time. The image is definitely new but the form of expression is that of 'utpreksha'. Sali's lyrics, whether they describe the beauty of nature, or express feelings of patriotism, look like descriptive passages from the medieval epics. There is only one exception to this rule and that is a poem called 'Tilanjali', an elegy written on the untimely death of his son. This poem will remain a triumph of the personal over the mechanical poetic conventions. In this poem, personal emotion, instead of being cramped by the rigid conventions and obsolete idiom, gets universalized through the use of fresh and original images.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Sali has written the famous story of Upagupta and Vasavadatta in verse, and this poem has both passion and colour, although it lacks character and argument. This is also perhaps true of his more ambitious work Ramayana. A striking description or a telling image may arrest the reader's attention for a moment, but the verse never rises above the level of prose. This is perhaps the reason why his Ramayana did not reach great heights as poetry.

K.D.K.

SALIHA ABID HUSSAIN (Urdu; b. 1913), an eminent fictioneer, was born at Panipat. She is a grand-daughter of the famous poet, Khwaja Altaf Hussain Hali, who heralded the modern age of Urdu, and the daughter of the late K.G. Saqlein, who was himself an eminent writer. She did her B.A (Hons.) from the University of Punjab as a private candidate. She married the late Abid Hussain, an eminent scholar, in the year 1933. She started her literary career at an early age by contributng short stories to women's journals. Her first creative work, a collection of short stories, entitled Naqsh-e-awwal, was published a long way back in 1939, and her first novel, Azra, appeared in 1940.

Saliha has been a prolific writer and has a number of books to her credit. Her significant works include: Novels: Azra (Delhi, 1940), Atishe-khamosh (Delhi, 1952), Qatre se gauhar hone tak (Lucknow, 1957), which won the U.P. Government Award, Raah-e-amal (Delhi, 1963), Yaadon ke charagh (Delhi, 1966), Apni apni saleeb (Delhi, 1972), Gori soye sej par (1978); Short stories: Naqsh-e-awwal (Delhi, 1939), Saaz-e-hasti (Delhi, 1946), Niras men aas (Bombay, 1948), Naunage (Allahabad, 1959); Dard-o-darman (Delhi, 1965); Plays: Zindagi ke khel (Allahabad, 1957), Iffat (Delhi, 1946) Imtihan (Delhi, 1952), which was awarded by the Ministry of Education, Prem aur seva ki jeet (Aligarh, 1958), an award winning book; Biographies: Yadgare-Hali (1950), Zikre-Jameel (Biography of K.G. Saiyidain, 1974); Criticism: Adabi jhallkian (Allahabad, 1959), Khawateene-Karbala (Delhi, 1973). In addition to the above works, Saliha has written many books for children and neo-literates and translated works into Urdu and Hindi.

R.G.

'SALIK', ABDUL MAJEED (Urdu; b.1894, d.1959), an eminent Urdu journalist, poet, prose writer, orator and broadcaster, was born at Batala. He had his education there, and later at the Islamia College, Lahore. He did his B.A. and Munshi Fazil from Punjab University. Though he started writing poetry at the age of fourteen, it was a journalistic career that engaged his attention during the most fruitful years of his life. At the age of twenty, he launched a literary monthly Fanoos-e-Khyal (1914) from Pathankot. He edited the well-known children's magazine Phool and a journal for women Tehzeeb-e-Niswan from 1915 to 1920. During this period, he also edited the literary mothly Kahkashan started by Syed Imtiaz Ali Taj from Lahore. He was the editor of the prestigious Urdu daily Zamindar (Lahore) from 1920 to 1927. During the Non-cooperation Movement, he was sentenced for one year for writing an article which was regarded as seditious by the British Government. The apex of his journalistic career came with his launching of the daily Inqlab in 1927 which he edited till 1949. His column 'Afkar-o-hwadis' (Thoughts and events) used to be eagerly awaited by readers of all shades of thinking, and his editorials moulded the views of thousands. During the 'Kashmir Agitation' (1931-33), when Inqlab was banned in Kashmir, he started the weekly Kashmiri Musalman. Its entry into Kashmir, too, was banned. He lanuched Mazloom Kashmir and when this was also banned in Kashmir, he started issuing a poster-weekly Maktoob-e-Kashmir.

Well-versed in English and Urdu, 'Salik' could read and write Persian and Arabic and wrote poetry in Punjabi also. A man with scholarly erudition and sparkling wit, he was an engaging conversationalist and an impressive orator. His journalistic career was marked with his dogged struggle for the projection of the lot of the common man and for upholding high standards of independence of thought and expression. He wielded a facile pen and wrote racy prose with clarity and depth of vision. Having had the privilege of some literary guidance from literary stalwarts like Khawja Altaf Hussain Hali, Iqbal and Munshi Hayat

Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Bakhsh Rasa of Rampur, he cherished classical standards of Urdu prosody and his own ghazals are marked by rhythmic cadence and a dexterous exploitation of subtle nuances of words.

After Inqlab ceased appearing in 1949, 'Salik' devoted the last decade of his life to purely literary pursuits. He cherished the concept of 'literature for life', and though he had affiliations with the Progressive Movement in Urdu literature, he was against taking it to the extreme. Besides being actively associated with many literary and cultural organisations, he was a member of the Board of Majlis-e-Taraqqi-e-Adab, Punjab, and of the General Council of Anjuman-e-Himayat-e-Islam and was also on the Board of Film Censors of Pakistan. He also worked as a Trustee of the Associated Press of Pakistan (Eastern News Trust).

Most of Salik's books were published either before 1927 or after 1949, the interim period having been dedicated to his crusading journalism. His books published before 1927 include Chitra and Naya chand (translations of Tagore's works), Champa aur deegar afsaney, and his only poetic anthology Rah-o-rasam-e-manzil ha. The second updated edition of this anthology was brought out posthumously. His books published after 1949 include Sarguzasht, an autobiography; Zikr-e-Iqbal, authentic biography of the celebrated Urdu poet; Yaaran-e-kuhan, containing pen-portraits of contemporary stalwarts; Muslim saqafat Hindustan mein, a research document accredited by the UNESCO. A collection of his diverse writings in Punjabi, Salik atey Punjabi adab was brought out posthumously.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Darul Firqaan 'Salik Number' (Lahore, Feb. 1960); Jagan Nath Azad, Aankhen trastian hain (1981).

Az.G.

'SALIM', WAHIDUDDIN PANIPATI (Urdu; b. 1859, d. 1929) was born at Panipat, district Karnal (Haryana). His grandfather migrated from Multan to Patan, where his father, Haji Fariduddin, was born. Later, they shifted to Panipat. 'Salim' joined Oriental College, Lahore, where he did his Matriculation and Munshi Fazil with distinction. He then studied medicine, and later, Law, but discontinued his studies owing to the death of his maternal uncle, and returned to Panipat. In 1887, he joined as Lecturer in oriental languages in Bharatpur College. In 1890, he started practicing medicine in Panipat.

In July 1894, at the instance of Maulana Hali, 'Salim' went to Aligarh and worked as Literary Assistant to Sir Syed Ahmed Khan until the latter's death in 1898. There he edited Maarif along with Haji Mohammad Ismail Khan, and on the death of the Haji in 1900, he continued to edit the journal on his own. He shifted the journal to Panipat and its publication ceased in December 1901.

His brother, Hamiduddin, established the Hali Press in Panipat, and Maulana Salim worked for it. He returned to Aligarh in 1907 where he was asked by Mohsinul Mulk to edit the Aligarh Institute Gazette. In 1912, he was invited to edit the Muslim Gazatte, published from Lucknow. He edited the journal up to August 1913 when he had to leave under pressure from the authorities for his fiery writings. He then joined Zafar Ali Khan, editor of the Zamindar, published from Lahore. But, because of his fiery writings, the security deposit of the press was forfeited, and he left for Hyderabad in 1919 to join the Translation Bureau of Osmania University for translation of scientific and academic terms. Later, in 1924, he was appointed Professor and Head of Urdu Department in the Osmania University.

Maulana Salim was a poet of merit, and in the beginning, wrote under the pen name of 'Maftoon', and later, adopted the pseudonym of 'Salim'.

A collection of his poems, entitled Afkare Salim, was posthumously published in 1938. Another collection of his writings, Ifadate Salim, edited by Syed Ashraf Hyderabadi, was published by the Mercantile Press, Lahore. His other works include Waza Istalahat, a compilation of terms (Delhi, 1931), Mazameene Salim, collections of essays in two volumes. (Karachi, 1961). A number of authors have brought out books on Salim, his life and works.

R.G.

SALOKA (Rajasthani) or siloka, is a corrupt form of the Sanskrit word 'shloka'. The term has been defined in prosody and widely used in literature. It consists of four lines, each made up of sixteen to twenty 'matras', having two long vowel marks at the end appearing as rhyming terminations. The subjects of saloka are manifold, and have been categorised under different heads. Religious salokas are written on the Hindu pantheon and allied subjects, while the Jain salokas deal with preceptors and Tirthankars and in praise of places of pilgrimage and other centres of religious importance. Historical salokas have such men and women as their subject as have left their mark on public life. Didactive salokas are the works of scholars or Gurus who have projected the ideals of character or given maxims of successful life. These salokas have been composed in praise of gods and goddesses, such as Saraswati, Ganesha, Surya, Mahesha, Rama, etc. Rao

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Amarsingh (Nagaur), Maharaha Ajitsingh Rathod, Kushalsingh, Bhati Keharsingh, Maharaja Mansingh, etc. form the subject matter of some of the historical salokas.

Even during the 18th-19th centuries the genre was in use. In our own times, it has been practised by modern poets like Umaradan Lalas who wrote his masterpiece on the famine of 1899-1900, which still haunts the memory of the people.

Agarchand Nahta, the doyen among the research scholars of Rajasthan, tells us that the salokas as a genre are available in the Jain works written as back as the 15th and 16th centuries. They originated, perhaps, from the occasion of marriage when the groom reached the bride's house, and was asked to recite some salokas. Eventually, however, the salokas were written by professionals and recited by people. The language used was gradually changed from Sanskrit to the local dialect. Salokas are also available in the Gujarati language. Raghunathrupaka, a famous treatise on prosody, has defined the saloka as a prose metre having rhymed terminations. Nahata has given a fairly long list of salokas, mentioning a few anthologies consisting of them. Perhaps, beginning as a folk genre, it has tried to cover new areas of experience.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.C. Nahata, Prachin kavyon ki rup parampara; 'Rajasthani saloka sangraha', Parampara (No. 65).

N.S.B.

SAMA, BALKRISHNA (Nepali; b. 1902, d. 1981) belonged to the great trio of Nepali literature, the other two being Lekhnath Paudyal (1884-1965) and Lakshmi Prasad Devkota (1909-1959).

First and foremost Sama was a poet; then a dramatist, essayist, philosopher and short story writer. The ordering looks quizzical, but it is based on a critical assessment of his works. He has produced nearly ten great works, and the greatest of them all is the epic, Chiso chuhlo. The Nepali poets do not subscribe to the modernist view that the age of writing epics has long been past. Sama has taken into account the objections raised against the writing of epics by Edgar Allen Poe et al, and has produced a glorious modern epic entailing a new definition. His collection of poems published posthumously contains two hundred and twenty poems. In his poems he is a thinker, a sharer of life and experiences, a superb painter, and a master of a deceptively simple way of writing, all rolled into one.

Sama has written seventeen plays, eight of which are poetic dramas. Yardsticks as are usually applied to the plays of Shakespeare, Shaw or Ibsen are not of much relevance in judging his plays. Poetic achievement is what we have to look for in them. Humanism was his credo. Mention may be made of such plays as Mutuko vyatha, Dhurba, Prahlad, Amita vaasana, U Mareki Chaina.

As a philosopher-thinker Sama set forth the principle of 'regulated accident', maintaining that the world and life are ever propelled onwards and are manifested as accidents, not haphazard but regulated by occurrences in time and place. His philosophical treatise Niyamit akasmikta and his minor epic Ago ra pani deal with this propositional theme.

Sama as an essayist, short story writer and one-act playwright ranks very high in the hierarchy of Nepali literary writers. His autobiographical work Mero kavitake aradkana in two volumes stands apart as a singularly great work.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Taranath Sharma (ed.) Vyakti ra kriti.

M.D.R.

SAMADAUNI (Maithili), Skt. Samvada vani, represents a series of farewell songs, especially to bid adieu to the daughter when, after marriage, she leaves her parents' house. These songs express intense feelings and are very touching. They are sung by women in Mithila on other occasions also, such as the immersion of the image of goddess Durga at the close of the festival of Navaratra. There are fine specimens of songs of this class and there is always an elegiac note in them. The most important of these songs are 'bidai gits' (farewell songs) which affectionately touch on the activities of the daughter as a child and the growth and development of her personality till marriage. Finally, they advise her as how to conduct herself in her husband's home so as to maintain peace and harmony.

Vidyapati was a great composer of Samadauni and it is mostly his compositions that are usually sung on festive occasions in Mithila and elsewhere. He was followed by Gananatha Jha and Vindhyanatha Jha who have made significant contributions in this field.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jayakanta Mishra, History of Maithili Literature (Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi); Radhakrishna Choudhary, A Survey of Maithili Literature (Deoghar, 1976); Upendra Thakur, History of Mithila (Darbhanga, 1956).

U.T.

SAMAJPATI, SURESHCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1870, d. 1921) was born in Calcutta and was the son of Gopalchandra Goshal Samajpati. He learnt Sanskrit under the tutelage of Pandit Iswarchandra Vidyasagar and started writing in Bengali when he was only fourteen years old. For long he was associated with Bangiya Sahitya Parishad and took active part in its proceedings. He was also a good orator.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Samajpati began to write at a time when the influence of Bankimchandra Chatterjee was pervasive and people were still sceptical about the genius and versatility of Tagore. Along with Kaliprasanna Kavya Visharad, Dwijendralal Roy and Bipinchandra Pal, Sureshchandra Samajpati led a sustained attack on Tagore and produced adverse criticism of his works. He had a genius for scathing satire and attacked his opponents ruthlessly. His misplaced zeal to defend conservative values finds vigorous expression in the pages of magazines and newspapers such as Sahityaklpadrum, Sahitya, Basumati and Sandhya which he edited in different phases of his life. He was not much of a creative writer in the conventional sense of the term. Among his books mention may be made of Kalipuran (tr. 1886), Saji (A collection of stories, 1990), Europer maha samar (The great war of Europe, 1915), Ranabheri (tr. 1910) and Chhinna hasta (The amputated hand, a novel, 1922).

Mo.A.

SAMAN BAI (Rajasthani; b.1825 d.1885), a popular saint poetess, was born at Siyali, a village in the erstwhile state of Alwar (Rajasthan). She was the youngest child of Ramanath Kaviya, a renowned Charan poet, and was educated by her father himself. That was why she could easily grasp the art of poetry and write devotional poems. Her husband, Ramdayal, was the great grandson of Barhath Umedaram Palhawat, the famous poet. The literary atmosphere that marked the two families was responsible for her literary bent of mind. On her marriage she told her husband that she wanted to lead a life of denial and renunciation, dedicating herself to the love of the Lord, and he agreed to respect her wishes. In her poems she spoke of him as a soul as benevolent as God Himself. It is believed that she once had a glimpse of Radha and Krishna during the rainy season, whereafter she decided to see no one else and covered her eyes with a strip of cloth all her life. There is a certain spontaneity in Saman Bai's songs and Bhajans as seen in her works like Ish mahima, Sri Krishnopama and Pati patropama. Her compositions are in varied metres, such as savaiya, kavitta, and paddhari. The glory of God, the generosity of her husband, the devotion to Radha and Krishna, 'Danlila' and 'Phag' are some of the subjects of her poems. Her language is Rajasthani, mixed with Brijbhasaha. It is a practice with the charans and most Rajasthani families to sing a song or two composed by Saman Bai on all family and social occasions.

B.D.G.

SAMANTA SIMHARA, ABHIMANYU (Oriya; b. 1757, d.1806), eminent Oriya poet, was born in a Kshatriya landlord family at Balia in Cuttack district. He was educated at a traditional Sanskrit school and later learnt Vaishnava literature and philosophy from Sadananda Kavisurya who also initiated him to the Vaishnava cult in his youth. He is said to have composed poems at the early age of nine. His 'Baghagita' (Ballad on tiger hunt) and 'Chadeigita' (Ballad on bulbul fight), though creations of tender age, are unique in Oriya literature for their vividness of imagery and spectacular action.

He is regarded as the most famous poet of the ornate age or Riti yuga of Oriya literature. Bidagdha chintamani, his masterpiece, is read and appreciated among all classes of Oriya speaking people. It is an epic consisting of 96 cantos and, though unfinished, is considered at par with the best works of his predecessor Upendra Bhanja, the stalwart of the ornate age.

The theme of this epic is the love 'lila' of Radha and Krishna. The poet pays homage to Lord Jagannath, Radha-Krishna and Chaitanya simultaneously in a single verse in the invocatory shloka (Mangalacharan). The sublime emotions, vision of divine love and the sweet melody of the verses have made the poet immortal in Oriya literature. He has experimented with more than sixty ragas (musical modes) and a hundred varieties of alankaras here. Part of his poetry is full of high rhetoric and philosophy, part of it strikingly simple and lucid.

He has three other works to his credit, namely Rasavati, Premakala, and Sulochana which seem to be the creations of his younger age. Premakala is a romance in sixty-four chhandas (cantos), modelled after the riti age, and deals with imaginary characters. After his initiation to the Vaishnava cult of the Raganuga sadhana, he wrote only about the life of Lord Krishna and his consort Radha. His poems are immensely popular in rural Orissa where they are recited and sung by wandering minstrels. For the exquisite musicality and evocative power of his poetry, Abhimanyu has been called the Swinburne of Oriya literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Mayadhar Mansinha, History of Oriya Literature (New Delhi, 1962); Murari Mohan Jena (ed.), Samanta Simhara samiksha (Cuttack, 1975); M.M. Chakravarty, 'Notes on the Language and Literature of Orissa', Journal of Asiatic Society of Bengal

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

(Dec. 1897); Surya Narayan Das, Odiya sahityara itihasa (Cuttack, 1963).

Do.S.

SAMANTRAY, NATABARA (Oriya; b. 1918), a leading critic and researcher, was born at Delange in the district of Puri in a lower middle class family of peasants. Financial difficulties stood in the way of his higher education, and he wandered from place to place in search of a job and opportunity for studies. Finally, he did his B.A. and B.Ed. privately, and later his M.A. in Oriya while working as a school teacher. His pursuit of research and scholarship eventually brought him a lectureship in Oriya literature.

Samantray worked on an unexplored period of Oriya literature and wrote a highly commendable thesis, Odia sahityara itihas 1803-1920 for his doctoral degree.The research is based on his study of old and rare periodicals, government records, and many obsolete documents. Recognition of his merit as a first rate critic, capable of doing original research, came from diverse directions—literary magazines like Dagara and Jhankar, literary meets like 'Visuba Milan', and the Orissa Sahitya Academy which gave him an award on his book Odia sahityakar Artaballabhanka dana.

Samantray is a critic and an essayist of a high order, and is considered an authority on modern Oriya literature. Significantly, he has made valuable contribution to the interpretation of ancient and medieval poetry also. The special features of his writing are originality, scientific analysis, wide references, and a desire to discover the truth.

Some of his most significant publications are Vyasakavi Fakir Mohan (1957), Adhunika Odia sahityar digdarshana (1959), Odia Vaisnaba sahitya (1959), Chilika kavya (1960), Galpa nuhen samalochana (1963), Adhunika Odia sahityar bhittibhumi (1964), Odia sahityar itihas (1964), Sakhahina panchasakha (1975), Odia sahityara swarare paribartana (1976) and Odia sahityare samikshya-o-samgraha.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : K.C. Bhuyan, Odia lekhaka parincharya (1968); Natabara Samantray, Mu keepari gabeshana kali; Sahitya samachar (July, 1963).

P.P.

SAMARA TARANGA (Oriya) by Brajanatha (18th-19th c.) is a beautiful war-poem in Oriya with a few stanzas in Khoratha or Hindi. It comprises seven cantos, written in various metres (raga and ragini) used in medieval Ritikavya. Like his prose-kavya Chatura vinoda, the present work is also a creation of his independent personality suggesting a break from the beaten track of erotic poetry. It is a lively description of a battle fought over the issue of tribute, between Trilochana Mahindra Bahadura, Raja of Dhenkanala (a tributary estate of the Marathas) and Shimanji, the Maratha Governor, in 1781. It is a unique work of its kind because for the first time in Oriya literature we get the realistic picture of war, actually fought and witnessed by the poet. In the short length of the poem, we get vivid details of war, such as initial preparation, warriors taking position in the battle field, elephants, horses and camels poised for attack, feelings of soldiers on the eve of war, marching of the army, horrors of battle, wailing of the wounded and dying warriors, and disarray among the fugitives. The descriptions reveal not only the poet's observations but also his deep knowledge of warfare. The whole poem is enjoyable owing to its heroic sentiment and lively descriptions enriched by appropriate similes, metaphors, and images in a language and style, both direct and lucid. The Raja, the commander-in-chief of the Dhenkanala army, has been raised to the level of a classical hero, and his heroic and fiery words of encouragement to his commander and courtiers certainly have remarkable literary merit. The poet has at times distorted history to suit his poetic purpose. The work has also been criticised as an overdone panegyric written for an unworthy king. Yet, in spite of the factual inconsistencies, the work has an important place in Oriya literature. After the composition of the great Oriya epic Mahabharata by Sarala Dasa (15th c.), Samara taranga is the only striking war poem in Oriya, though there are three other war poems, Paika Kheda by Kahnei Champati, Kanchikaveri by Purushottama Dasa and Budhapanka yuddha pothi by Nursimha Kabirchandra Rayaguru (19th c.).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Manasinha, Odiya sahityara itihasa (Cuttack, 1967); Natabar Samanta Ray, Badajena sahitya samiksha (Cuttack, 1971); Ramesh Chandra Dhal, Badajena parikrama (Cuttack, 1972); Suryanarayan Dasa, Odia sahityara itihasa (Cuttack, 1971).

G.B.

SAMARAICHCHAKAHA (Prakrit), or Samaradityakatha, is the first available religious fiction (mahadharmakatha) and the earliest work extant in the champu style (mix of prose and verse), composed by Haribhadrasuri in the eighth century AD in the Maharashtri Prakrit language, interspersed throughout with sermons.

The work commences with salutation (mangala) followed by a brief description of the three kinds of subjects (concerning gods, gods and men, and men only), four kinds of stories (artha, kama, dharma, and samkirna), and three kinds of hearers (the low, the middle, and the highest). The present story is called 'dharmakatha' and deals with gods and men.

Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It depicts the fate and wanderings of two characters, a hero who is virtuous, and an antagonist who is villainous, passing through nine births to illustrate the doctrine of karma and the concept of nidana (retribution). The man who kills, or plots to kill someone, goes to hell or is born as an animal. The hero, ultimately, attains emancipation, while the antagonist remains entangled in transmigrations on account of his intense hatred. In their nine births the two characters are born as follows: Gunasena and Agnisharma (prince and priest), Simhakumara and Ananda (father and son), Shikhin and Jalini (son and mother), Dhana and Dhanashri (husband and wife), Jaya and Vijaya, Dharana and Lakshmi, Sena and Visena, Gunasena and Vanamantara, and lastly Samaraditya and Girisena.

The present novel illustrates the evil consequences of sins and transgressions of the moral code. There is a constant struggle between the ideal and the real, and the victory goes to the former. The novel becomes somewhat tiresome, reading about the continuous wanderings of the same two souls in different lives and their strange destinies. For slight sins the punishments are heavy, and merely for honouring a monk the award is very high. There are, however, some occasions when the stories are interesting and romantic. The romance of Dharana and Lakshmi and the intervening story of Sanatkumara and Vilasavati, who re-unite after long separation, are quite interesting. Some other intervening stories too give us relief.

There are a number of subsidiary stories of varying length. Some of them are previous life stories, some parables, some fairy tales, some biographies, and some independent episodes.They are there to explain some religious point, or moral, or the consequences of harbouring passions and violating the vows, or to illustrate the fruits of the deeds of previous life. There are apologues too. Many of them give a picture of Indian life and are quite lively. Familiar fairy-tale motifs are also there. Some tales are indigenous and adapted by the author, and some belong to universal literature.

The style of the work is simple, lucid and fluent. It is not so elaborate as that in Kuvalayamala. There are long compounds in descriptive portions, but in pure narrative they are simple enough. In the metrical portions they are elaborate but not intricate. There are ornate figures of speech and riddles as well. The style, on the whole, is well suited for an audience with a sense of culture rather than great learning. The verses are mostly in the 'gatha' metre, a few in other metres. The language of verse is Maharashtri, though in that of prose there is an influence of Shauraseni.

The work is of no less importance in cultural history as it was written when old traditions were disappearing and a new cultural consciousness was beginning to assert itself at the end of the ancient period and the beginning of a new one. It has rich material for the religious, economic and cultural study of northern India in the 8th century AD. Some notable topics are the festival of Cupid, marriage celebrations, court life, the Charavaka philosophy, the temples of Naga, Katyayani and other goddesses, Skanda as the presiding deity of thieves, the thief's charming pill, the life of the Shabaras and Chandalas, land journeys and sea-voyages, foreign trade, hurdles before sea-traders, brisk commerce between eastern India and the islands of the East Indies, the goings-on between Tamralipti port, Katahadvipa, Suvarnadvipa, Ratnadvipa, the town of Tagar and so on. The book is thus of great significance both as a religious novel and as a social chronicle.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hermon Jacobi, Samaraichchakaha of Haribhadrasuri (Asiatic Socity of Bengal, Culcutta, 1926).

K.R.C.

SAMARASAWE JEEVANA (Kannada) by Vinayak Krishna Gokak is a novel running into 1156 pages. To this is added a novel in English, titled Narahari, Prophet of New India continuing the same story. H.A. Navaratna translated this novel into Kannada which forms the last part of the series. To the combined volume is added about twenty pages covering his previous prefaces. The book, as it stands in the second edition, contains 1226 pages. Ignoring the later addition of Navayuga Pravartaka Narahari (Narahari, Prophet of New India) the novel took more than twenty-two years for its completion. The first edition was brought out by Manohara Grantha Mala, Dharwad, in 1956; the second, by Usha Sahitya Male, in 1967. The third, which includes the translated version of Narahari, Prophet of New India, is published by Suruchi Prakashana, Mysore.

The novel began with the narration of the life of only two families, but later it enlarged its scope of tracing the mental development of the character Narachari through a number of experiences. Though the original locale of the story is Moggavi, Narahari later shifts to Poona. The narration goes on and the incidents leading to his imprisonment and subsequent return to the native soil to set up an Ashram are described in great detail. There are two more protagonists—Sheenu and the Maharashtrian Patankar—who too achieve a reconciliation with life's ironies. The novel has been described as 'picaresque'. The main character Narahari is a determined idealist. Like the heroes of the Gandhian age, he is not only a nationalist and Gandhian but also aims to achieve a state of spiritual perfection in his personal life. After his early tribulations including an incestuous invitation from his young step-mother and his exit from home, he develops intimate contact with a freewheeling Guru named Swamidas. He undergoes a transformation in life, with the support of his beloved wife, Kusuma. The harmony and mutual faith in this couple strike a positive note in the novel, and redeem it of pessimism. Thus Gokak's idealism is an organic necessity for the readability of Samarasawe jeevana.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The other important feature of the novel is the vast geographical canvas which brings together people of different regions and cultures. Though the hero, Narahari, keeps to the home country, his vision is enlarged by his studies in a Poona college, and his contact with Swamidas helps him develop an attitude of spiritual humanism. The other two protagonists, Sheenu and Patankar, undertake a voyage to England and meet Englishmen and Indians from other provinces. They get an opportunity to study various cultures and behaviour patterns. Their experiences form an important part of the novel's main plot.

The novel is episodic. Each episode is linked with the coming episode through deliberate effort as expounded in the detailed preface. Each episode is characteristic of the persons involved and faithful to their cultural and educational background. The linkages between episodes help build up the identity of the characters. Even the language used for dialogues of different characters immediately identifies them. Thus the episodes become a single epic of love and duty. What was meant to be a single regional novel cleaves through the regional limits and extends to the vast universe and beyond. What should have been temporal and confined to the just awakened renaissance of Karnataka breaks through the time limits and becomes a symbol of the newborn nation's cultural and political aspirations. The novel may be described as a chronicle in the Edwin Muir sense of the term. It satisfies many of the preconditions laid down by Lukacs for historical realism, though it depicts recent history.

S.M.P.

SAMAUR, SANKARDAN (Rajasthani; b. 1824, d. 1878) was an inspiring Charan poet, born at Bobasar in district Sujangarh (Rajasthan). His stray poems in dingal git, chappay and doha metres are mostly available in the oral tradition on a variety of subjects. Some gits describe contemporary events and heroes, such as Dungaji, Jawaharji, Tantiya Tope, the policy of the British, famine, devastation caused by locusts, etc. Some others are in praise of Shakti and Bhairava. The gits and chappays describing Shakti or Devi are collectively known as 'Sakati-sujas'. The chappayas in praise of the river Ganga are called 'Bhagirathi-mahima'. Poems in dohai metre are 'Bagat ro bayaro', 'Des-darpan', 'Saket-satak', etc. They depict vividly the prevailing chaotic socio-economic and political conditions of the country, attitudes of the rulers of the States, the baneful policies of the British, the oppressive administrative system, the plight of the nationalists and of the downtrodden and poorer sections of society, and the realities of everyday life. The language of his poems is fluent Rajasthani, and style pointed and forceful. He was a poet of the people and was progressive in his outlook.

Hi. M.

SAMAVAKARA (Sanskrit) is one of the ten varieties of drama as described in Bharata's Natyasashtra.

According to the definition in Natya shastra, a samavakara consists of three acts. It deals with the exploits of gods and demons, with plenty of scope for the depiction of deception, excitement and love. In this dramatic division, there could be twelve or more heroes and the ending is always positive. Bharata also states that the duration of the act of samavakara is fixed; the first act should have twelve nadikas, the second four nadikas and the third two nadikas (One nadika is roughly equal to 24 minutes).

The chief hero of Samavakara is a noble (udatta) person and the chief sentiment (rasa) is heroic. However, other sentiments may be depicted suitably. Samavakara has a prologue (prastavana) like nataka. It may display all varieties of dramatic 'vrittis', but 'kaishiki' is to be sparsely used. There should be a reference to a fraud practiced by opponents and also to calamities.

In Sahitya darpana, Vishvanatha cites Samudra mathana as an example of samavakara. Lakshmisvayamvara of Venkamatya (18th c.) could be cited as another example of samavakara.

H.V.N.R.

SAMAVEDA (Sanskrit) is a collection of mantras prescribed for chanting at various Soma sacrifices by the

Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Udgatri (priest) and his associates, thus serving an avowedly ritualistic purpose. Though called Samaveda, it is not strictly speaking a collection of 'samans'. It is essentially a derivative production in the sense that most of its mantras are derived from the Rigveda.

One may imagine three distinct stages in the evolution of this Veda. First, there is some specific mantra from the Rigveda in its original form. This mantra is then taken over in the Samaveda and made the basis of a proper saman or chant. The only change that is effected in this process is the marking of the accents Nos. 1,2 and 3, now being used to indicate the accents instead of the vertical and horizontal lines as in the Rigveda. In this second stage the mantra is called the Samayoni mantra. The Samaveda samhita is actually a collection of such samayoni mantras.

The collection is made up of two main parts—the Purvarchika and the Uttararchika. The purvarchika consists of 585 single verses, the first 114 being addressed to Agni, the next 352 to Indra, and the last 119 to Soma, while the uttararchika consists of 1225 verses, grouped into 400 units of connected verses, mostly trichas. The total number of mantras in the Samaveda, not counting the repeated ones, is 1549, out of which all but 78 are taken from the Rigveda, mostly from the eighth and the ninth mandalas.

It, is however, not in the form in which they occur in the Samaveda samhita that these mantras are employed by the Udgatri (priest) in connection with the soma-ritual. The samayoni mantras are transformed into chants or ritual melodies called ganas, by means of such devices as modification, prolongation, and repetition of the syllables occurring in the mantra itself, and the occasional insertion of additional syllables (stobhas, e.g. huva, hovi, hoi, etc.). These ganas, which represent the third and final stage in the evolution of the Samaveda, are collected in four books, namely, 'Gramageyagana', 'Aranyageyagana', 'Uhagana', and 'Uhyagana'. Of course, these gana-collections are quite distinct from the Samaveda samhita. Normally, each gana included in these collections is given some technical name like Brihat, Rathantara, Gotamasya parka, etc. Since one samayoni mantra can be changed in a veriety of ways, it may give rise to several ganas. For instance, three ganas, namely Gotamasya parka, Kashyapasya parhisha and another Gotamasya parka, have evolved out of the first mantra in the Samaveda samhita. Consequently, the number of Samaganas is much larger than the Samayoni mantras, the number of ganas in the Jaiminiya school being 3681 and that in the Kauthuma school 2722.

Thirteen Shakhas (branches) of the Samaveda are traditionally mentioned, though only three, namely, Kauthuma, Ranayaniya and Jaimini, are better known today. Patanjali, in his Mahabhashya, speaks of the Samaveda as having 'one thousand paths'. This characterisation presumably suggests the large number of possible modes of sama, i.e. chanting 1000 shakhas of the Samaveda.

In the Bhagavadgita (X.22), the Samaveda is glorified as the most excellent of the Vedas. This may be due to the great efficacy of the magical potence engendered in the Vedic ritual by the chanting of the samans. Understandably enough, there is also the other side of the magic of the Samaveda, which has given rise to the tradition that, since some portions of the Samaveda are connected with 'abhichara', (withcraft) the recitation of the Rigveda and the Yajurveda must stop at the sound of the chanting of a saman.

The meaning of the word saman is 'savara' or 'chhand.' In the Archika and the Uttararchika words are merely the means, but the purpose is to formulate the musical ragas and raginis. The Udgatri had to study these ragas first at the pathashalas. The Archika thus is a book of songs where the first 'rik' of each song is given for the recollection of the raga.

The Uttararchika consists of 400 ganas (three riks comprising one gana). Here the riks are arranged according to deities whereas in the Archika they are arranged according to metre. A stotra comprises three or more riks. The Uttararchika is thus the book where complete songs are given.

In singing the samans the singers emphasised the pronunciation by the movements of hands and fingers. It appears that the chhandas of town-singers and forest-singers differed (e.g. gramageyagana and aranyageyagana).

The original meaning of the word 'saman' was probably 'a prayer song', a hymn to god-attainment. It might also have had the connotation of 'conciliatory means'. It also has a sense of 'voice' (svarah samashabdenochyate, or stobhadivishishta rik sama - shabarabhashya on Mimamsasutras, 7.2.1). It also means ' a mantra of magical potence (chhandas)', ' a sacred text', ' a melodious speech', 'that which gratifies' (chhandayati).

The Samaveda serves as a means to understand the history of the institution of sacrifice and witchcraft. The ganas are extremely important to assess the development of Indian musicology. The Shabarabhashya on the Mimamsasutra rightly defines saman (7.2.1) as a particular rik sung with stobha, svara, kala, abhyasa, and possessing himkara, pranava prastava, udgitha, pratihara, upadrava and nidhana.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In transforming the samayoni mantras into ganas there are six types of modifications which the words undergo. These are: vikara, vishleshana, vikarshana, abhyasa, virama, and stobha.

The Brihaddevata says. 'One who knows the samans knows the secret of the Vedas.' Krishna says in the Bhagavadgita: 'Vedanam samavedosmi.' The Chhandogya says: 'Omkara is the essence of the Samaveda.' And the Rigveda says: 'The samans go to him, who is awake.'

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Durgadas Lahiri (ed.), Samaveda samhita: Mahadevashastri Joshi, Bharatiya samskritikosha; R.N. Dandekar, Insight into Hinduism.

V.G.R.

SAMAYASARA (Prakrit; b.112, d. 8 BC) by Acharya Kundakunda is a famous philosophical work in the realm of Jaina ontology. Its author was a great saint, philosopher and logician who propounded Jaina mysticism in his works. Samayasara deals with the nature of the self, the word 'Samaya' having been used as a synonym for Atman or Brahman. 'Samayasara' is a compound of two words, Samaya and Sara. It is also called 'Samayapahuda', in Sanskrit 'Samaya Prabhrita': 'Samaya' means pure soul and 'Prabhrita' implies ' Sara', i.e. essence. Thus the treatise is called Samayasara, the essence or the essential nature of the self.

Although the soul in its essence is all purity, perfect knowledge, and a state of bliss, yet in association with karmic matter and impure thought processes it becomes oblivious of its reality and is absorbed in the mundane.

The essential nature of the soul, however, remains unchanged. In the words of Acharya Kundakunda, 'As gold heated in fire does not give up its golden nature, so the knower, though agitated by the operation of karmas, does not give up its nature of knowing.' The soul has ever been existing with its knowing nature. As Kundakunda explains, one substance on being used by another cannot lose its essence and does not become another. The knower remains the knower. Knowledge is not separate from the knower. Impure thought-activity is not knowledge as it is always unconscious. Knowledge is the special attribute of the soul. The attribute of a substance pervades the substance and is inseparable from it; therefore the knowledge and the knower are really one, having no separate existence.

Every soul has always a separate identity. It never loses its individuality. It remains always the same enjoying all its inseparable attributes. The author starts with the thesis that the nature of the self is distinct from the modes and characteristics resulting from its combination with the Karmic matter whose nature is entirely distinct from that of the Ego-in-itself or Sva-samaya. This is the sublime and the beautiful in the whole world. The nature of the empirical self can be easily apprehended from the concrete world of living beings. In the words of the author: He who perceives the self as not bound, not touched, not other than self, steady and without any difference, understands the whole Jaina doctrine which is the kernel of the scripture. The author emphasises the fact that complete realisation of the perfect self is identical with the perception of the whole reality, which is the main issue discussed in the Jaina scripture. Knowledge of the knower is also the knowledge of the known. The knower, because he realises his own true nature, is uninfluenced by the environment, his own body or other mundane objects. The knower neither produces the various kinds of karmas nor enjoys the fruits thereof, nevertheless he knows the nature of karmas and their results, good or bad, as well as the bondage. Knowledge, too, like the eye-sight, is neither the doer nor the enjoyer of karmas, but only knows the bondages, the release, the operation of karmas and shedding of karmas.

It is a well-known fact in our experience that visual perception and the perceived object are not causally related to each other. Knowledge is useful in deciding good or bad, living and non-living, the self and the non-self. It is said that sensory knowledge is inferior to the knowledge of the self.

Bondage is caused by impure thought-activity; the things are not the cause of bondage. Knowledge is the essential quality of the self. So long as this quality is strong and intense, the self is unassailable by external influences, but when this quality is at its weakest, the self becomes easily influenced by alien conditions.

The first marked characteristic of mysticism is spiritual knowledge. Self-knowledge or spiritual knowledge is a characteristic feature of transcendental life. 'Know thy self' is an oft-quoted maxim. Knowledge of the self is supreme knowledge. Samayasara maintains that he who has spiritual knowledge knows his true nature, and he who lacks spiritual knowledge, being blinded by his own nescience, is unable to perceive his true nature. In other words, the self with spiritual knowledge, by contemplating upon the pure self, becomes pure. But the self which contemplates upon the impure becomes impure. Thus, it is pointed out that the nature of the contemplating self is determined by the nature of the contemplated ideal. It is only possible when the discriminative knowledge, free from error, arises in the self; then the nature of the self, manifests (itself) in the form of pure 'upayoga' and does not cause any kind of impure materialistic states. Various impure emotional states have no intrinsic relation to the nature of the self, because they are accidental states of the self and as such can disappear without, in any way, affecting the nature of the self.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Secondly, spiritual knowledge is always accompained by spiritual bliss. Actually, spiritual knowledge and happiness are one and the same thing. Therefore, spiritual knowledge, which is perfect and pure, which spreads over infinite things, is called real happiness. Acharya Kundakunda tells us that the self who has abolished the knot of delusion (Moha), who has overthrown attachment and aversion and is indifferent to pleasure and pain, attains eternal happiness.

Thirdly, spiritual steadfastness is another feature of transcendental life. The mystic is a unique being. His interest is only spiritual knowledge and in that knowledge of the self he is steadfast. Self-experience and steadfastness automatically conquer the sense, mind and passions.

Fourthly, intuitive insight is a characteristic mark of mystical experience. The intuitive insight is the 'Pratyaksha Jnana' or direct and complete apprehension of reality. The direct knowledge perceives all the non-concrete things alongwith the concrete and those that are beyond the scope of the senses, those that are hidden, and all others that are related (or not related) to substances. Moreover, the mystic who possesses self-knowledge, directly visualizes all objects and their modifications; he never comprehends them through sense-perception. A mystical state is a free state. None of the seven types of fears is found in the mystic. Fear relating to this life, fear relating to future life, fear of being without protection, fear of the disclosure of what is kept secret, fear of pain, fear of accident, and fear of death are not seen in a mystic. The Yogi or a mystic sleeps where worldly business is concerned and is awake in the business of transcendental experience. Similarly, he who is awake in worldly matters sleeps in the business of the self. True mysticism is, indeed, active and practical, not passive and theoretical. It is the spiritual life that is totally free from worldly things. And transeendental experience is not a temporary phase in a mystic's life; it is a permanent state of the transcendental self. Thus a mystic attains his union with the divine or the absolute spirit.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Chakravarty (tr.), Samayasara of Acharya Kundakunda (Bhartiya Jnanpith, 2nd ed., 1971.)

D.S.

SAMAYASUNDARA (Gujarati/Rajasthani; b. c. 1563, d. c.1645) was a well-known poet of old Gujarati and Rajasthani languages. A prolific writer in Sanskrit as well, he occasionally wrote in Hindi also. Samayasundara was an ascetic of the Jaina Shvetambara sect and a pupil of Sakalachandra and Acharya Jinachandra Suri. As a Jaina teacher, he was constantly travelling on foot to different parts of the country, and his numerous works were composed in Gujarat, Rajasthan, Sindh, Uttar Pradesh, Punjab and Kashmir. His longer works in Gujarati and Rajasthani include Nala-Damayanti rasa which narrates the Jaina version of the story of Nala and Damayanti, and Sitarama prabandha which presents the Jaina version of the Ramayana. Vastupala rasa describes the life of Minister Vastupala who built the famous Jaina temple at Mt. Abu. It also contains a popular tale, Hamsaraja Vaccharaja chopai.

Samayasundara was, in fact, an outstanding rāsa poet with more than thirty rasas to his credit. Besides the rasas mentioned above his other important works in this genre are Samba Pradyum ras, Mrigavati charitra chaupai, Punyasara rasa, Valkalchiri rasa, Tejpal rasa, Shatrunjaya rasa, Thavachcha chaupai, Champak shreshthi chaupai, Gautam Pruchcha Chaupai, Dhanadatta chaupai, Punja rishi rasa and Draupadi chaupai.

Samayasundara has also written many religious hymns and lyrics. His voluminous Sanskrit writings deal mainly with the Jaina religion, metaphysics and rituals. He has also written a Sanskrit commentary on the Kalpasutra, an important text of the Jaina canon in Prakrit, as well as a commentary on Raghuvamsha, a Sanskrit classic by Kalidasa. He is also known for his 'stavanas' and 'sajjhayas', some of which are still recited by the Jainas during their religious ceremonies.

A contemporary group portrait of Samayasundara with emperor Akbar and some of his courtiers has been preserved at Bikaner in Rajasthan. It is said that he astonished the emperor with the reading of his latest work, Anekartha ratna manjusha, in which he gave more than eight hundred thousand meanings of a single Sanskrit sentence, 'Rajano dadate sankhyam'. This work has been published (1933).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Mohanlal Desai, Jaina Gurjara kavio, Part I (Bombay, 1926); Jaina sahityano samksipta itihasa (Bombay, 1933); Muni Sampatavijaya (ed.), Ananda kavya mahodadhi, Vol VII (Surat, 1926).

B.J.S.
R.C.S.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

RAJASTHANI: Samayasundara occupies an important place not only for his Rajasthani writings in the tradition of Jaina poetry, but also for his contribution to the literary history of Rajasthani, Gujarati and Hindi. He was born in a Jaina family in the town of Sanchor (Marwad), and was initiated by Jinachandra Suri in the year 1578. His father was Rupasi and mother Lilade (Dharmashri).

Samayasundara has numerous literary works to his credit. Though he has written in Sanskrit, Rajasthani, Gujarati and Hindi, he was quite well versed in Prakrit, Sindhi and Persian as well. He has written several rasas, chaupais and chhattisis in Rajasthani, besides smaller compositions which include about 560 geets, padas, etc., now published in a book-form under the title Samayasundara krit kusumanjali (Calcutta, 1956). Another comparatively smaller work, Dushkal varnan chhattisi, a widely known poem, gives a touching description of famine which afflicted Gujarat in 1630. His other works Priyamllak tirth prabandhe sinhalsut chaupai, Valkalachiri chaupai, Champak Seth chaupai, Vyavahar yuddha visaye Dhanadatta Shresthi chaupai and Punyasar chaupai have been highly spoken of, and are know available in a collected volume, Samayasundara ras panchak (Bikaner, 1961). These are small and composite descriptive/narrative poems which dwell on the virtues of noble living, purity of thought and action, and perseverance in one's faith, illustrated from the lives of characters concerned. Among his major works, the most popular is Sitaram chaupai (Bikaner, 1963) which narrates the story of Rama and Sita as available in the Jaina tradition. This work and the other five mentioned above are recited in various 'ragas'. Samayasundara was, indeed, a distinguished poet and scholar of his age.

Hi.M.

SAMBADPATRE SEKALER KATHA (Bengali), Vols. I and II, edited by Brajendranath Bandyopadhyay, was published from 1932 to 1952. The volumes tried to recreate the socio-economic, literary and political life of Bengal between 1818 and 1840 through a collection and collation of material in newspapers and magazines of the period. The most representative of the magazines was Samachar darpan, and Bandyopadhyay could collect all its copies from 1818 onwards. This magazine also published excerpts of news and views from other newspapers and magazines. However, facts collected from other papers, like Samachar chandrika, Bangadut and Sambad purna chandrodya, are collected in the appendix.

The excerpts collected in the two volumes of the book have been arranged under four broad headings—Education, Literature, Society and Religion. The facts not covered by these divisions have been collected under the Miscellaneous section. The reader is able to re-create conveniently the life and ethos of Bengal from these volumes. The first section deals with the spread of education by the establishment of schools and colleges and the writing and publication of books. It was thus that the influence of Europe was first felt in Bengal and the Bengalis were inspired with the zeal of reform and reconstruction. Among the institutions which did a commendable job in this regard, the most notable were Hindu College and the Calcutta School Society. This section also contains information about the controversy on women's education and the learning of classical languages like Sanskrit, Persain and Arabic.

In the second volume there is a fair amount of information about Derozio, Captain Richardson and David Hare. regarded as teachers and ideals for young Bengal. One can also know about the contribution of clergymen Carey and Marshman to the life and literature of Bengal. The second section deals with the different aspects of Bengali literature and laguage until 1840. It contains discussions on such issues as the style of Bengali language, loan words from European sources, and use of Sanskrit words in regional languages. Original works, either in Bengali or English, were meagre. The books published during the period have been classified under four heads: (1) Reprint of old Sanskrit texts along with Bengali translations, (2) School text books, (3) Translation from English, and (4) Translation from Indian texts into English. This section also deals with the periodical literature in Bengal, and the reader gets acquainted with quite a few magazines in Bengali, English, Hindi, Persian and Urdu.

Though the third section is 'Society', it is much more than a documentation of social rituals and behaviour. The facts in this section are, again, classified into seven sub-sections: Morality, Entertainment, Philanthropic Institutions, Economic Conditions, Administration, Health, and Personalities. The facts collected under Morality demonstrate the changes brought about by the continuous inflow of the European influence into education and social behaviour. Entertainment contains information about traditional Bengali entertainments like dance, masque, journey, wrestling, and contest of poets. Economic condition contains facts about the establishment of banks and insurance companies in India, trade, market price, and the economic situation under the British. The facts incorporated in the section Religion are concerned with external rituals relating to Hinduism, such as worship, marriage, sati, funeral rites, pilgrimages, and sacrifices of different kinds including human sacrifice. However, for the sake of convenience these subjects have been classified into six groups in the second volume. They are: Religious Activities, Religious Sanctions, Religious Places, Religious Meetings, Meetings of the Brahmos, and Miscellaneous. The practice of sati had just been made illegal through a government act. People in Calcautta agitated against this and decided to appeal to the Privy Council in England against the act. This section also contains some information about the religious festivals of the Muslims.

Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The facts not taken care of under the above four sections have been incorporated in the section Miscellaneous. In this section we have diverse information relating to different subjects like buildings, roads, mansions, bridges, both in rural and urban areas,the total number of houses in Calcutta, etc. We also come to know about the advent of the gas lamp and the steamship in Calcutta. The section also gives information about the different communities of India.

The volumes are an interesting source of information on the life of Bengal during the early decades of the nineteenth century.

Mo.A.

SAMBANDA MUDALIAR, PAMMAL (Tamil; b. 1873, d.1964) is considered the Father of Tamil theatre. He lifted it from the low repute it had fallen into and gave it a respectable place in society. The folk theatre groups who performed in street corners or open grounds, as well as the drama troupes modelled on the Parsi theatre who performed on the stage were socially looked down upon. Sambanda Mudaliar who had an elitist contempt for theatre soon outgrew it. He established an amateur theatre group, Suguna Vilasa Sabha, in 1891 when he was hardly eighteen years of age. Started with just seven members in 1891, it gradually became a powerful and highly influential institution.

The emergence of this theatre group was historic in many ways. Mudaliar, in a gradual process of evolution, raised the theatre to a high level of professionalism. For the first time, he insisted that there be a definite script which should be rigorously adhered to without any improvisations by the actors. The drama of those days was replete with songs and the dialogues were reduced to a negligible minimum. A play succeeded or failed only on the basis of an actor's capacity to sing or on the strength of the appeal the songs made. The plays were more like operas than plays proper. To begin with, Sambanda Mudaliar reduced the duration of the play (which used to prolong till the early hours of the morning next day), and discouraged the propensity of the singing actors to launch on elaborate raga expositions to show off their skill. He insisted that the costumes be authentic and suited to the characters and their historical setting. For authenticity he would draw on the sources available in temple sculptures and frescoes, miniature paintings, descriptive details in literature, etc. rather than rely on the set types as costumes of kings, queens, soldiers, and so on. He was careful about scenic arrangements and choice of stage props, avoiding anachronisms. It was quite common in his time for a vidhushaka to enter the stage with his comic enactments even during the most inappropriate moments. Mudaliar put a stop to all this. Though he could not do without songs at the start, he cut them out gradually, and in about two decades he could stage plays without songs altogether. What he achieved was, indeed, a revolution, though it took long for his innovations to get accepted in the milieu of Tamil theatre in general.

Sambanda Mudaliar started scripting the plays for his Sabha himself. His first attempt was to take a current play that impressed him and re-write it for his theatre. For example, he trimmed Sirahari, which he saw staged by Govinda Swami Rao, rewrote it and staged it under the title Pushpavalli. However, the play he first thought of was Shakuntalam, available in Monier Williams' English translation, and started translating it into Tamil. That was when he was just 18, still at school, but being a perfectionist he took many years before he completed it and staged it. Over the many decades of the Suguna Vilasa Sabha's existence and his own role in it as a playwright, producer and director, he built up an impressive repertoire of over 94 plays which consisted of adaptations/translations from Shakespeare (As You Like It, Hamlet, The Merchant of Venice, Macbeth, Julius Ceaser, Othello, Henry IV, etc), Sanskrit plays of Kalidasa and Sri Harsha, plays of Moliere, and plays based on the puranic episodes that were popular in Tamil theatre but were adapted to his fashion and liking. His repertoire consisted of his own works also which became very popular and were staged by other theatre groups as well all over the south. Some of them have been filmed (Sathi Sulochana, Manohara, Sabapati, Vedala ulakam, etc) not only by himself in the early 30's but also by others in the subsequent decades in repeated versions. He was meticulous about what he did. For instance, he took about seven years to translate Shakespeare's Hamlet; he worked hard to adapt it in Tamil prose trying his best to capture the original's dramatic power and spirit.

He was a man given to humour and wrote several burlesques and farces; for instance, he turned the Harishchandra episode upside down, by creating a character, Chandra Hari, a king who had never uttered a word of truth all his life. This was later filmed by the Tamil comedian, N.S. Krishnan, in the 40s.

Sambanda Mudaliar knew nothing of music, Telugu and Sanskrit, but he started learning them, for the believed that for a life dedicated to theatre, a knowledge of these was a necessary accomplishment. In this approach to theatre, he was as much guided by his knowledge of English theatre as by his knowledge of Sanskrit theatre. He was the first man to introduce tragedies on the Tamil stage, though the theatre tradition was against them. In his first tragedy, Kalvar Thalaivan, which he scripted in 1894, one saw all the characters die as in Shakespeare's Hamlet. Though he had a dislike for the folk-play Therukkoothu, he introduced it as a play-within-play in his own production, which by its incongruous interpolation could be shown in the light he wanted, but would be right in its place in its play. He was again the first to introduce characters from the ordinary run of life belonging to lower classes at a time when kings, gods and characters in the heroic mould alone were the inviolable norm and worthy of theatre. He wrote plays depicting normal social life and was also the first to stage one of his plays in the open because he thought it to be the right setting for action rather than the conventional stage. For the first time in Tamil theatre, he introduced novel lighting techniques.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Thus, most of his innovations were the result of his commonsense approach and instinctive responses to the stage. He was, however, in two minds when it came to women taking part on the stage. Here the moralist in him had a decisive say. He came out with a declaration that in the present social context, he was against women coming on the stage and he would rather wait for the day when women on stage did not suffer from ignominy. Besides, he felt the male actors could play female roles effectively. This, he said, was a tribute to the actor's acting abilities. When, in the early decdes of this century, Bharata Natyam was confined to the 'devadasis' he introduced it in his plays, danced no doubt by male actors. This was decades before Rukmini Devi Arundale emerged on the scene to revive Bharata Natyam and give it a place of honour, dignity and artistic excellence.

The fame of Sambanda Mudaliar's venture spread far and wide and he took his troupe to not only the outlying district towns of the Tamil-speaking areas but also to cities in other linguistic regions like Bangalore, Nellore, Trivandrum, etc. Quite a number of times, the troupe visited Ceylon and Burma on invitation.

He published all the plays he scripted, without encouraging improvisation in them. He built the Suguna Vilasa Sabha into an institution. Men of eminence from all walks of life such as judiciary, education, national politics, men like C.P.Ramaswami Iyer, R.K. Shanmugam Chettiar, V.V. Srinivasa Iyer, E.Krishna Iyer and Satya Murthi were all drawn to it. They took active part by acting on the stage, by translating and directing the plays for the Sabha's repertoire and by giving memorial lectures.

Sambanda Mudaliar believed that amateurs alone could dedicate themselves to the art of theatre rather than professionals who would be more intent on commercial success than perfection of art. He elevated theatre to respectability and became a legend in his own life time. He won many honours, including an award from the Sangeet Natak Akademi for acting. The President of India conferred on him the title of 'Padma Bhushan' in 1959. He has to his credit about 94 plays, besides a voluminous work on his life, entitled 40 Years before the Footlights, which is an uninhibited self-confession, laying bare his weaknesses, failures and success. All his 94 plays may not survive as dramatic literature, but his work in theatre was a major contribution. And his memoirs would be of enduring interest for their reflection on the state of theatre and society from 1890s to 1930s.

Ve.S.

SAMBASIVA RAO, PUTUKUCHI (Telugu; b. 1929), novelist, playwright, short-story writer, poet and literary organiser, was born in Alamoor, East Godavari district. A lawyer by profession, he has written in all the known genres of literature. His Udaya kiranalu (1956), a social novel with a middle-class family background, was adjudged the best novel in an Andhra patrika competition. His other novels include Edu rojula majili (1960) and Anveshana (1962) which won an award from Telugu Bhasha Samithi. His plays include Hantakulu (A.P. Sahitya Akademi Award winner, 1969) and Palle kadilindi, a play on the new awakening in villages. His one-act plays including 'Idi tantu' (1954), 'Donga' (1955) and 'Dora' (1958) have been produced successfully on the stage. Rao has published six volumes of short-stories, including Sekharam kathalu in two volumes, which reveal his keen awareness of the problems in the contemporary world. Besides these, he has also published four thin volumes of poetry and a part of his autobiography. His short volume on a lawyer's advice is of general interest. Rao is also a successful organiser, especially of literary clubs and writer's conferences. Presently, he is Secretary of the All India Telugu Workers' Conference, the last meet of which was held in 1981 at Visakhapatnam.

M.N.S.

SAMGHADASAGANI (Prakrit). In the great tradition of Agamas, the name of Samghadasagani is associated with commentaries. He is also known as Kshamashramana and was a contemporary of Haribhadrasuri (AD 730-830). He was pre-eminently the first scholar who wrote great bhashyas. He compiled the Brihatkalpa-bhashya and the Panchakalpa-bhashya, the two important voluminous works. Brihatkalpa-bhashya is divided into six parts, and consists of 6,400 gathas in Prakrit language. It deals with the daily disciplines of Jaina monks and nuns, and is a work of moral discipline:

Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

> What you desire for your self, desire for others also; what you do not desire for yourself, don't desire for others—this is the quintessence of Jinashasana.

Another work by him is known as Panchakapa or Panchakalpa-bhashya, comprising 2,665 gathas. It is regarded as a part of Brihatkalpa-bhashya originally.

There was another writer by the name of Samghadasagani who wrote the first part of Vasudevahindi, an epic in Prakrit, approximately in the fifth century AD. Vasudevahindi occupies an important place in world literature. From the point of view of story-telling it occupies the same position as Gunadhya's Vaddhakaha in Paisachi language. It is a great treasury of tales, and is divided into two parts, the first part comprising 29 chapters, equivalent to 11,000 shlokas, the second part comprising 71 chapters, equivalent to 17,000 shlokas. The tales are educative and entertaining and are written in a simple and lucid language, and possesses all the important elements of folk-tales.

D.S.

'SAMI', CHAINRAI BACHOMAL (Sindhi; b. 1743, d. 1850), was a distinguished Sindhi poet, who vernacularised the Vedic wisdom in his slokas (shlokas), or verses, in the Sindhi 'bayt' form. He was born in a well-to-do family of businessmen of Shikarpur, Sindh, which had been, because of its peculiar geographical position, the greatest mart of north-west India.

As regards the year of his birth, there is no unanimity of opinion. While Kauromal Chandanmal Khilnani, the first editor of Sami's slokas, computed it as 1743, Mulchand Giani, who also published Sami's 2100 slokas in two volumes, was of the view that Bhai Chainrai D'ataramani Lund (for that was Sami's full name, 'Sami' being his pen-name) was born in 1731 and died in 1850, when his son Ghanashyamdas was about 40 years old. But to the majority of commentators of Sami, Kauromal's view has been more acceptable.

In Shikarpur, the D'ataramanis resided in a house, opposite to Jugal Pyari Thanw, in Nandhi Bazar. They kept this house till 1850. Soon after his father's death, Ghanashyamdas sold it away, for he used to live in Amritsar where he had his business concern.

As was the practice in those days, Chainrai was married off at an early age. A householder, he worked as one of many agents of Seth Tindanmalani, who imported the merchandise from Iran and Khurasan by caravans. For the business firm he represented, he used to visit Punjab and sell the goods. He always remained content with whatever percentage of profit he received from his principals. His discontent lay elsewhere; from his very childhood, he was in quest of some real merchandise, or 'sachcha sauda', a la Guru Nanak. Once, as he was sitting with Seth in his office, he saw a 'Mahatma', a great soul, passing by. He rose from his seat and went to meet the Mahatma, bowing at his feet. Later, he said he was the same person he had dreamed of at night prior to the day he met him, and broke in poetry: 'ochito achi, saj'anu bitho samuhon' (The real friend apeared suddenly before me).

It was when he was about 30 years old that he came into contact with the 'Real Friend', Swami (or Sami in Sindhi) Meghraj by name. The Swami originally hailed from Ahmedpur of the then Bahawalpur State and came to Sindh to live in the Brahmana Hemandas' 'marhi', or monastery, at Hathi Dar in Shikarpur. He was well-versed in Vedanta and Sanskrit kavya. Chainrai benefited greatly from his learning and studied Vedanta in the original Sanskrit for about ten years. Besides Shankara's 'Advaita' (non-dualism), which forms the core of his poetry, he seems to have learnt from his Guru something about Nimbarka's 'Dvaitadvaita' or 'Bhedabheda' (difference and non-difference) which appears in his slokas on 'bhakti'.

He had already read the Sindhi saint and sufi poetry and was conversant with Gurumukhi and Devanagari scripts in which the Hindu Sindhis wrote their language at that time. By the age of 40, he developed a great poetical power and composed verses, at once lyrical and mystical. This he did in the name of his Guru, Swami Meghraj; 'Sami' became his pen-name. He wrote the verses in Sindhi, in the Gurumukhi script, on slips of paper and went on depositing them in an earthen pot.

At the ripe age of 68, 'Sami' took his wife on pilgrimage to some sacred place. On their way back, they visited Amritsar. There a holy man granted them a boon that they would soon be blessed with a son, and they waited in Amritsar to see the boon come true. Thereafter they decided to live in Amritsar, near the shrine of the Sikhs, where he wrote hundreds of slokas.

During Sami's life time, the political power in Sindh

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

changed hands twice—from the Kalhoras to the Talpurs, and from the Talpurs to the British. Yet we hardly find any direct reference to the worldly, ever-changing facts in his poetry. In one of the slokas he remotely says, 'Kalijug'a ja kura, mire, matamadi chaudhari' (The rulers, fanatics and landlords represent the liars of the 'kaliyuga'). He led a quiet life given to the contemplation of the Supreme Soul. Yet he performed all the duties peculiar to an existential situation. The kind of life he led reflected in his slokas, in one of which he says:

He who shuns the diabolic 'dvaita', and engages himself in the service of Man,
Disabuses his mind of the evil and realises
Him in elephant and ant alike,
Is the Mahatma, while others
grope in the dark and reel in the dirt.

True to the tradition of the land, he did not ignore wealth ('artha') and pleasure ('kama'), but remembered the higher call for righteousness ('dharma') and thereby for release ('moksha') from the human bondage.

In his view, as in that of other saint-poets of India, there exists a close relationship between religion and philosophy—the relationship which makes the religion somewhat philosophic and the philosophy a wee bit religious. On the one hand, the Bhagavata, the scriptural book of the laity, induces in him devotion for the Personal deity Krishna, and on the other the Brahmasutra of the elite enables him to have knowledge of the nature of reality. But, as the common people would even know without studying the Brahmasutra in the original text, Sami understands that the Personal deity ultimately becomes the Impersonal Brahman and transports us to the region of consciousness where the Personal is realised as That One ('Tad Ekam') He says:

I hear Krishna non-stop playing on the flute;
two ears hear That One and don't feel satiate;
And I wish I were in the timelessness of the lilt.

Brahman, in contradistinction to the western conception of God, creates the world from Himself, and not from any extraneous matter; he is both the material and the efficient cause of the world, 'the clay and the potter of the pots'. As in the Taittiriya Upanishad, Sami holds that the beings are born from Brahman, they live by Him when born, and they enter into Him on death. He shows Himself in the world.

A saint-poet who appeared on the scene during the last phase of Bhakti Movement, Sami wrote slokas embodying everything that the Movement espoused, that is, unity of Godhead, unity of existence, equality on the basis of religion, caste and economic status.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Kalyan Advani, Sami (Bombay, 1953); L.H. Ajwani, History of Sindhi Literature (Delhi, 1970); Lekhraj Aziz, Sami (Bombay, 1965); Mohanlal Sharma, Sami (Delhi, 1972); Muhammad Ibrahim Joyo, Shah-Sachal, Sami: 1689-1950; Hiku mutal'io (Hyderabad, Sindh, 1978).

Mo.J

SAMIA JA SLOKA (Sindhi) is a compilation of the 'Slokas', or verses, by the Sindhi Vedantin poet Sami Chainrai Bachomal. After 35 years of the poet's death in 1850, Kauromal Chandanmal (1844-1916), collected his 2,100 slokas, the ones he had written while he was in Shikarpur, Sindh, before he came to reside in Amritsar, Punjab, and brought them out in an edition of three volumes published between the years 1885 and 1890.

This 3-volume edition of Sami's slokas contains the editor Kauromal's preface, giving the saint poet's biography in short, the guest writer Dayaram Gidumal's gist of the poet's teachings and at the end a glossary. In his preface, Kauromal also refers to an earlier attempt of 1874 when 800 of the slokas were published in Gurumukhi script. Since the job was badly done, he undertook to present as many as 2,100 slokas, correctly transcribed in the Perso-Arabic script for fuller appreciation of the Sindhi Muslims also.

Since Sami wrote his slokas in Gurumukhi on pieces of paper and treasured those slips in a big earthen pot kept in a corner of his shop in Shikarpur, Kauromal raised an age-old question elsewhere, outside of his edition Samia ja sloka: Does a poet write for his own pleasure (svantah sukhaya) or for universal pleasure (sarvantah sukhaya)? The 'svantah sukhaya' poets are said to write primarily for themselves, only because they feel driven. They speak or write verse for whoever hears it or reads it, and leave it at that. But, it seems that the poets have definite audiences in their verse through word of mouth or in hand-written form. They may not be keen to leave their bio-data, but they take enough care to preserve their work for posterity, believing that 'sarira' (body) is short-lived and 'shabda' (the word) is perennial. Sami also did not care any the less for his slokas. He saved the slips on which he wrote in duplicate, for one set of slips was lost to a 'sadhu' who had promised to edit them and get them published in a volume, and then disappeared. Bhai Ghanashyamdas, Sami's son, tried to locate the sadhu and retrieve the slokas, but in vain.

After Kauromal Chandanmal's edition, the slokas written by Sami in Amritsar were also published. Thereafter, several editions appeared in Gurumukhi, Devanagari and Perso-Arabic scripts. Among them are: (1) Bhai Khushi Singh's 2,100-sloka edition in Gurumukhi (Lahore, 1900); (2) Bhai Gangaram's 3,500-sloka edition in Gurumukhi (Lahore, 1900) which incorporates 1,400 slokas written in Amritsar; (3) Master Hari Singh's 3,500-sloka edition in four volumes in Perso-Arabic script (Sukkur, 1901); based on Bhai Gangaram's edition, it contains the slokas in the alphabetical order; (4) Malik Hira's 3,500-sloka edition in Gurumukhi (Lahore, 1904); (5) Mulchand Giani's 2,100 sloka edition in two volumes in Gurumukhi (Quetta, 1910); quite a useful work, it contains the slokas, correctly transcribed, and according to their subject matter, e.g. the slokas dealing with 'maya', or illusion, are grouped together in the alphabetical order; (6) Parsram Parumal's 3,500-sloka edition in three volumes in Devanagari script (Bombay, Vol. I, 1956; Vol. II, 1957; Vol. III, 1958); and (7) B.H. Nagrani's 3,500-sloka edition in three volumes in Perso-Arabic script (Bombay, Vol. I, 1955; Vol. II, 1958; Vol. III, 1967). The first definitive edition of Samia ja sloka, B.H. Nagrani's work presents the slokas subject-wise, and in two alphabetical lists, the one collecting the slokas, written in Sindh and the other giving those written in Punjab. The editor is of the view that in the absence of information regarding which slokas were written when, it is better we arrange them according to their various subjects. In the previous editions which did not attempt at bringing the slokas together from the viewpoint of subjects, one sloka would place the 'jiva', or soul, in union with God and the other immediately following it would degrade him for his vices of 'kama' (desire), 'krodha' (anger), 'lobha' (avarice), 'moha' (attachment) and 'ahamkara' (pride): this would confuse the reader and obstruct his realisation of 'Rasa', the poetic relish. In the Samia ja sloka, edited by Nagrani, something approaching a variorum is intended in listing important variants from the earlier editions of Kauromal Chandanmal, Bhai Khushi Singh, Malik Hira and Mulchand Giani, and an attempt has been made at the explication du texte, making generous use of recent scholarship on Sami in the annotations.

Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

From among the selections from Sami's poetry, a mention may be made of: (1) Wadhumal Mulchand's Samia ja sloka, containing 650 slokas in Perso-Arabic script, 1st edition, Hyderabad, Sindh, 1938, 2nd edition, Ibid., 1945, the latter having been reprinted twice from Ajmer in 1953 and 1955. While the first edition carries the foreword by Jethmal Parsram, the second edition does so by Vishin Jagtiani. Jethmal, instead, contributes an erudite essay on Sami's life to the second edition. Besides, Kalyan Advani adds a scholarly essay on Sami's language and style. Wadhumal Mulchand's introduction to the selection enhances its value for the Sami scholars; (2) B.H. Nagrani's Samia ja chunda sloka (New Delhi, 1963) is mainly based on his earlier work; (3) Abdul Karim Sandilo's Samia sandyun sipun (Larkana, Sindh, 1975), in the foreword of which Allahadad Chughtai says that as early as 1859 (Sami died in 1850), five of his slokas were published in the Sindhi language textbook compiled for the third standard by Prabhudas Ramchandani and since then the slokas have come a long way to become a proud part of the common Indo-Pakistan Sindhi heritage.

Besides, a selection from Sami's poetry appeared in English translation by Shanti L. Shahani entitled Song of the Spirit, published from Karachi in 1947.

Samia ja sloka or the verses of Sami, are composed in the poetic form of 'bayt', which is a blanket term for 'doha' 'soratha', 'tunveri doha', 'baro doha', presented separately, or for such two or more forms, interlinked together. Like the bayts of the preceding Sindhi sufi poets, the slokas of Sami have either two stichs or more than two stichs, each stich having 24 'matras' according to the rules of Indian prosody. But the bayts and slokas, though metrical mainly, would often give short vowels as long vowels and vice versa, for the Sufi and saint poets sang their bayts and slokas, caring little for the rules.

Unlaboured and effortless the language of the slokas in their vocabulary, the phonological and grammatical structure is related to Sanskrit and Prakrit. With not many Arabic and Persian words, his vocabulary abounds in the Sanskrit 'tatsama', 'ardha tastsama' and 'tadbhava' words. Of the six dialects of Sindhi, Sami's is Siraiki, the dialect of northern Sindh. The use of 'shabdalamkaras' (figures of sound) such as 'anuprasa' (alliteration) and 'yamaka' (paronomasia) makes the language still sweeter, Siraiki being 'the sweet Sindhi dialect' already.

Sami's imagery is drawn from what he sees around him in the day-to-day life. For instance, the images 'kamal' (lotus) and 'bhramar' (the black bee), 'jala' (water) and 'mina' (fish), 'sipa' (oyster) and 'moti' (pearl), 'sagar' (sea) and 'gagar' (pot), and 'mriga trishna' (mirage) are quite familiar to his readers. Through these images, Sami objectifies his emotion and achieves 'shanta rasa' (the tranquil).

As he himself said, his poetry interprets the vedantic thought in Sindhi. He sings of the union of the many with the Supreme One. Sadhu T.L. Vaswani rightly observes in his foreword to the above-mentioned Song of the Spirit, "The heart of Sami's slokas is set upon a living and loving union with the One who transcends the many that change and pass. The many are the veils of 'maya': they shut off the Light, they must be pierced to behold the adorable face of the Beloved."

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

As in the above quotation by Vaswani, so in Sami's poetry, God is both impersonal and personal, transcendent and immanent. Mainly vedantic, his poetry at many places speaks of his Krishna-bhakti, or devotion to Lord Krishna. Greatly influenced by the Gita, it presents the poet's synthetic view in the final assessment. He says, 'karma, upasana, jnana, g'alhi chavani tha hikiri.' (The three yogas of action, devotion and knowledge say one and the same thing).

Mo.J.

SAMKHITTA TARAMGAVAI-KAHA (Prakrit), or Samksipta Tarangavata-katha (Skt.), is a pre-tenth century anonymous abridgement of the famous Prakrit katha in verse (Taramgavi-kaha), written by the Jaina Acharya Padalipta possibly in the first or second century AD. The original Taramgavai was highly praised in the Jaina tradition by eminent writers like Uddyotana, Dhanapala and Shilanka. As one of the earliest instances of the katha genre, its importance in the history of classical Indian literature cannot be over-stressed. Unfortunately, the original, like the famous Vaddakaha (Skt. Brihatkatha), has been lost.

Samkhitta Taramgavai-kaha has 1641 verses in the Gatha metre. The concluding verse names Jasa, probably the scribe. The book was further abridged with the title Kahavali by Bhadreshwara in the 11th-12th century.

The plot of Samkhitta Taramgavai-kaha is skilfully structured. It sustains our interest throughout. The story is narrated by a nun, Tarangavati, as her autobiography. It is a full-fledged romance with clandestine love, elopement, escape from the den of ruthless robbers, and happy reunion with her lover.

Born and brought up in a rich family of Kaushambi, Tarangavati, during a garden party suddenly recalls at the sight of chakravaka birds her previous birth. Her extremely happy life as a female chakravaka in her previous birth had a tragic end due to the accidental killing of her companion by a hunter. Her consuming love for her companion of previous life now revives. Hoping to meet him in this life, probably in Kaushambi itself, she prepares and exhibits during a public festival a picture panel depicting the key events of her former life. The son of a leading merchant of Kaushambi identifies the scenes as the story of his own previous birth. The lovers secretly establish contacts, but failing to get from the girl's father consent for their marriage, they elope, fall into the hands of some robbers and are confined to a cell as victims shortly to be sacrificed to the robbers' goddess. The prison guard, however, helps them escape. They return home safely and are married with great pomp.

Later, they visited a monk who, on their request, narrated his early life. It was he who, as prison guard, had set them free; in his previous life, as hunter, he had killed the male chakravaka. As prison guard, he had overheard Tarangavati narrating the story of her life to fellow prisoners. He, therefore, decided not to commit the same sin again. He let them escape from the prison and became a monk himself. Moved by this account, the couple renounced the world and embraced the monastic life.

A plot with several interesting turns, skilful interweaving of varied strands, suspense, sharply individualized and life-like characters, realisitic and vivid descriptions of scenes, sensitive treatment of emotional situations, and the touch of originality in figurative expression—these features make Padalipata's Taramgavai a remarkable achievement of narrative art. Tarangavati, throbbing with life and fired by intense, all-consuming passion, has a permanent place in the gallery of romantic heroines in ancient literature. The memorable passages describing Tarangavati's childhood, the chakravaka pair with their shared joys of living, the garden party, the full moon festival, the robbers' den, the village life, etc. leave a deep impression on the reader's mind, and Padalipt's art of first person narration together with flashbacks reveals the potentiality of the novel form.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.C. Bhayani (ed.), Samkhitta Taramgava-kaha (Ahmedabad, 1979); M.B. Jhaveri (ed.) Nirvanakalika (Bombay, 1926).

H.C.B.

SAMKHYA (Sanskrit) is one of the six classical systems of Indian philosophy. The word 'samkhya' is derived from the root 'khya', with the prefix 'sam', which means, 'to count'. Samkhya represents the trend of thought which aims at approaching Reality through an exact and comprehensive enumeration of its constitutive principles.

Samkhya did not perhaps emerge as a coherent system of philosophy during the Vedic period, but a number of concepts and trends of speculation did begin to appear during that time. It was approximately between the fourth century BC and the first century AD that the Samkhya doctrine really began to take shape. During this period, it remained closely linked with Yoga, both being two aspects of a single discipline. Samkhya provides the theoretical basis of human nature and the philosophy of emancipation through knowledge, whereas yoga provides the method for release, 'isolation-integration.' Both believe in a hierarchy of principles.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The doctrine of Samkhya is attributed to Kapila, the mythical sage. Besides the Shvetashvatara Upanishad, he has been mentioned in the Mahabharata, the Bhagavata and several other puranas. There are a few important texts relating to Samkhya, such as Samkhyapravachana, Tatvasamasa, Ishvarakrishna's Samkhyarkarika (c. 4th or 5th c. AD) and Vijnanabhikshu's Samkhyasara (c. 14th c.). Samkhya is perhaps the only philosophical system which does not have a genuine, ancient 'sutra' text — there are some 'karikas' (mnemonic verses) which expound the basic tenets of the doctrine, along with a series of commentaries.

Samkhya appears as a practical doctrine, emphasising the concept of dualism. It accepts the primary fact of suffering and the means of escaping it. It is opposed to ritualism and brahminical orthodoxy. According to Samkhya, worldly life is pervaded by eternal suffering. The only way to final emanicpation is the 'right cognition' (vijnana) of the 'manifested' (the visible, perceptible world), the 'unmanifested' (prakrit) and the 'cogniser' (purusha). Contrary to Vedanta and Buddhist philosophies, Samkhya believes the world to be existent and real also. Thus it accepts plurality even of souls, unlike the Vedantic system. Prakriti constitutes an equilibrium of three gunas — 'satva', which has the qualities of light and purity, 'rajas' which is the source of all activity, restless effort and feverish enjoyment, and 'tamas' which reduces activity, produces indifference and leads to ignorance and sloth. The principle of gunas is fundamental to Samkhya philosophy. All things are constituted by these three gunas in varying measure, and they constitute the effects — 'sukha' (pleasure), 'duhkha' (pain) and 'moha' (desire) respectively. The first product of purusha and prakriti is consciousness (buddhi). Then five primordial elements—ether, air, earth, light and water—are created, followed by the five organs of action. Buddhi enables purusha to realise the two ideals of life—'bhoga' and 'apavarga', i.e. to experience pleasure or pain or to attain spiritual elevation through the right knowledge. One who attains this level is the one capable of recognising the essential disparateness between prakriti and purusha. He attains the level of detachment and serenity. This, in a nutshell, constitutes Samkhya philosophy.

The impact of the Samkhya system on other systems, in particular Advaita Vedanta and Buddhism, is quite perceptible. The entire theories of five primordial elements (pancha bhutas) and of three qualities (trigunas) have been accepted in toto by the former school and the theory of eternal suffering (duhkha) has formed the basis of the Buddhist cardinal doctrine of suffering as one of the noble truths (aryasatya).

S.M.
Su.G.

SAMKSHEPAVEDARTHAM (Malayalam) is a book on scripture written by Clement Peanices (1714-82). It has the unique distinction of being the first Malayalam book to appear in print. It was printed in Rome in 1772 under the author's supervision. The types used are fairly large, with a rather square-like shape. Titled Compendiosa Legis Explicatio Omnidus Christianis Scitu Necessaria in Latin, the book runs into 276 pages of demi octavo size. Two hundred copies of the work were brought to Kerala, where they were distributed among the Catholics. Only one copy is believed to have survived the ravages of time and it became a precious possession of the Kerala Sahitya Akademi in December 1989.

The book, written in the form of a dialogue between a teacher and his disciple and divided into numerous sections, is, as the title indicates, the scripture condensed and translated into Malayalam. Considering the date and place of the book's publication and the kind of Malayalam then in use even in government correspondence, the style found in the work is admittedly admirable.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Chengarapalli Narayanan Potti, Malayala sahitya sarvaswam; T.M. Chummar, Bhasha gadya sahitya charitram; Ulloor S. Parameshwara Iyer, Kerala sahitya charitram (Vol. 3).

K.S.N.

SAMNAMA (Kashmiri), or the story of Sam, is a romance of Iranian origin which infiltrated into Kashmiri through Persian classics. In Kashmiri, this romance attracted the attention of two poets, Lachhman Raina 'Bulbul' and Amir Shah Kreeri (1839-1905).

'Bulbul's' Samnama is the first Kashmiri version of the Persian epic. In rendering this work into Kashmiri, both the poets have retained its original form of versification, i.e. masnavi.

'Bulbul' has rather condensed and adapted this version so as to fit it to his own surroundings. He has given a local colour to the entire story and made it more Kashmiri than Persian. He has used Kashmir as its background for the happenings in the epic, and this has made the work more appealing and attractive for the Kashmiri reader. His version of the tale is crisp and precise. He has dropped all the unnecessary details and laid more stress on the story element and characterisation. His command over language and versification has added to the grace of the epic.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It is because of its poetic grace and skill of narration that this masnavi has been able to sustain its popularity during the last nine decades. 'Bulbul' has portrayed all the characters in their true colours; but his genius is at its best while depicting two main characters of the epic, Sam and Pari Dakht, and describing their exploits. The number of verses in the epic is 1450, including the lyrics.

Amir's Samnama is a long masnavi. It is one of the longest epics in Kashmiri and contains as many as 9958 verses. The epic is divided into two parts, each part being divided into four chapters.

The language of Amir's Samnama is a mixture of Persian and Kashmiri. It is for this reason that this epic has failed to arouse interest among the critics and the readers. Besides, the defects in the rhyme scheme and metre are evident in the masnavi. His diction is defective and language more rustic than poetic.

'Bulbul's' epic was extensively read in its manuscript form in Kashmir. It was first published in 1962 by Jammu and Kashmir Cultural Academy under the editorship of Ghulam Nabi Khayal. Amir's Samnama was published by the same publishers in 1973. It was edited by Manzoor Hashmi.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Amin Kamil (ed.), Sheeraza Kashiri jangnama (1976); Chaman Bashir (ed.), Avhalnama (1979).

Mo.S.

SAMPURNANAND (Hindi; b. 1890, d. 1969), political leader, freedom fighter and litterateur, was born in Banaras, and passed the B.Sc examination from the local Queen's College. He worked as teacher at Prem Mahavidyalaya, Vrindavan, and later at Doongar College, Bikaner. Babu Shiv Prasad Gupta invited him to join 'Gyan Mandal'. Later, he served Kashi Vidyapeeth, and immersed himself in the nation's struggle for independence. He joined the Satyagrah movement, and went to jail several times. He became member of the Uttar Pradesh Legislative Assembly in 1926, Minister for Education in 1937, and Chief Minister in 1955. His last appointment was as Governor of Rajasthan.

Sampurnanand was well-versed in Sanskrit, Hindi, English, Urdu and Persian, besides being a scholar of physics, astrology and philosophy. For the first time, he wrote scientific novels in Hindi, titled Prithvi se saptarshi mandal and Antriksha yatra. The Hindi Sahitya Sammelan conferred the degree of Sahitya Vachaspati on him and awarded him the Mangalaprasad prize. He also received the doctoral degree (honoris causa) from several universities.

His contribution to literature is of considerable importance. His important works include Samajvad (Socialism), Chidvilas (God's phantasm), Jyotirvinod (Astrological humour), Kuchh smritiyan (Reminiscenes), Kuchh vichar (Reflections), Hindu dev parivar ka vikas (Hindu Dev family) and Grahnakshatra (Planets).

S.D.M.

SAMSA (Kannada; b. 1898, d. 1939) was the pen-name of A.S. Venkatadri Iyer, Kannada poet, story-writer, and a dramatist of extraordinary talent. He was born in Agara, Mysore district. He acquired deep scholarship in English, Kannada and Sanskrit, worked as a teacher for a few years before he gave up his job and travelled all over India. When he returned to Mysore in 1936 he had grown schizophrenic and was seriously ill. For some time, he lived in tragic isolation and subsequently committed suicide in 1939. Although he wrote voluminously and with indomitable will, most of his writings were either lost or destroyed and only a few of them are extant. 'Kowshala' (1914), a story, 'Srimantodyana varnanam' (1918), a poem, a sequence of poems on Sir M. Visveswaraya (1921) and a group of six historical dramas, are all that remains of his myriad writings. Samsa was an indefatigable royalist; in his historical plays he set out to glorify the virtues of the kings of Mysore. Ranadhira (Kanthirava Narasaraja Wodeyar) is his ideal of a great monarch and three of the six plays extant project him as the central figure. In Bettadarasu, the first of the Ranadhira trilogy, Vikramaraya, the illegitimate son of the dissolute king Chamaraja, dethrones the monarch and grows in sinister stature, colossus-like. 'Vigada Vikramaraya' takes up the thread of the story and depicts the designs and intrigues of the villain culminating in assassination at the hands of the palace guards, and the assumption of the throne by Ranadhira. Vijayanarasimha presents the charismatic power and glory of Samsa's ideal hero. Mantra shakti traces the romantic adventures of Ranadhira, his ultimate triumph over his enemies and his successful consolidation of power. Sugunagambhira is about King Bola Chamaraja Wodeyar and how he acquired the title after overcoming the petty chieftain Demati Venkatadrinayaka. Birudentembaraganda is a beautiful one-act play based on an amusing incident in the time of Thimmaraja Wodeyar III.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Samsa's plays abound in magnificent melodrama and thrilling 'spectacle'. Although he sets out to picture his king as a paragon of virtue and valour, his artistic sensibilities cannot help revealing the seamy side of royalty. His 'un-royal' characters like the bastard princes, courtesans, the palace guards and concubines emerge as more credible human characters. While he attempts to bring to life the cavalcade of history, he almost escapes into the make-believe world of the past which insulates him from the cruel realities of his own tragic life. The irony is that while Samsa envisions human perfection and ideal kingship, his heroes turn out to be thwarted idealists and heroism itself becomes an extraneously attributed virtue.

Samsa so thoroughly transposes himself into the antiquity of history that he forges a language which can aptly evoke the past. He rummages and ransacks ancient monuments and dusty documents before he devises a diction of his own. He compounds it with ancient metrical forms, Sanskritised phrases, and even archaisms. He, perhaps, is the only playwright in Kannada who wrote genuinely historical plays.

H.K.R.M.

SAMSAR BUTTI (Konkani), meaning 'deluge', is an outstanding work in Konkani by Vaman Raghunath Varde Valavlikar alias Sanai Goenbab (1877-1946). Written in lucid and simple language, it is the second volume of his philosophical treatise Gomantopanishad and is set against the background of the Noah story.

The human race having forgotten the teaching of the Lord is under threat of immediate annihilation. Twelve departed souls who ascend to heaven are interviewed, and each interview represents a philosophy of life. The twelfth soul—that of a Brahmin—expounds a philosophy of life which probably is the author's own.

The author is a scholar who has thoroughly grasped the teachings of the Vedas and the Upanishads, the Bible, the Talmud and the Quran, and has assimilated them in his own experience.

The author's philosophy of life is in accord with the central teaching of the main religions. He rises above myths and superstitions, and negates the concepts of Heaven and Hell, of the Day of Judgement and Salvation. As he says, life is re-created again and again, and is to be lived in a righteous way in pursuit of knowledge, without fear, overcoming all odds and in communion with fellow human beings.

Published in 1933, the book, besides its philosophical contents, shows the intrinsic beauty and strength of the Konkani language.

Ra.K.

SAMSKARA (Kannada) is a novel (1966) by U.R. Ananthamurthy. It proved an invitation to a storm, as it offended the sensibilities of the orthodox. The protaganist is Praneshacharya, a man of unquestionable rectitude. His antagonist is Naranappa, the hedonist. Naranappa's death creates a crisis in the village; since he had renounced brahminhood and defied all religious sanctions, how is his body to be disposed of? The learned Praneshacharya is called upon to guide but is himself at sea. When Chandri, the woman who lived with Naranappa, clasps his knees in supplication, the touch overwhelms him, and he surrenders to her. The touch of reality is a traumatic experience and he wanders away from his village. He has now come out of his ivory tower of erudition, and faces life anxiously yet hopefully.

Samskara proved to be one of the major works of the Navya Movement, and a classic verbal structure of Ananthamurthy's perception of man's existential plight. It revealed a sensitive shaping of prose, at once restrained, evocative and studded with images. The scene of the Acharya's surrender to the newly discovered—and overwhelming—nature of reality is one of the splendid achievements of modern fictional prose. The novel was filmed and proved to be one of the harbingers of a new wave in the Kannada film world.

Samskara has been translated into English, Hindi and other Indian languages. It has become one of the classics of modern Kannada fiction.

L.S.S.R.

SAMTANEY, GUNO (Sindhi; b.1934) was born in an educated family with literary background. He migrated to Bombay after the partition of the country. He studied Economics and Political Science for his degree examination and did his M.A. in History. He was brought up in very congenial environments for literary growth. Brothers and sisters, and particularly father, all were lovers of books and were voracious readers. Books influenced his vision of life and sharpened his sensibilities. In the early years of his youth, he went and lived in the Ashrams of Rishikesh (Hardwar). The study of religious literature influenced his language and style. During the initial phase of his literary activities, he composed poems, but that period was short-lived. In 1957, he switched over to short story, and one of his stories, 'Pralay' (1958), created a stir in the literary circles and established him as one of the top story writers. His novel 'Wapas' (The return, 1958) brought him to the forefront of Sindhi novel writers. The stories in his first collection, Abhiman (Ego, 1966) are experiments in the stream of consciousness technique. The stories are noted for sharpness of thought and content. Aparajita (Unconquered, 1970), another collection of his short stories, which brought him the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1972, set new trends in Sindhi story writing, and the short story got a new direction. Some critics described him as a romantic revolutionary of Sindhi short story. A full critical appraisal of his writings was done by a few eminent critics, which was published in a book entitled Guno Samtaney. Many other authors of different schools of thought, too, have written about his works.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

L.B.

SAMUDRA GEETHAGALU (Kannada) is a collection of poems (1940) in Kannada by V.K. Gokak. The title means 'From beyond the Sea'. The poems were written during the poet's voyage to England and his stay there (1936-38). It is one of the landmarks of modern Kannada poetry. The sea entered Kannada poetry as an experience and as a power for the first time. Other poets before Gokak had described the sea, and done it even vividly; but the sea is a fascinating, mysterious, living presence and power in these poems. The influence of the English Romantic poets was pervasive in this period, and it is felt here, too. The metrical experiments and the use of language, however, show a modernist spirit at work. The voyage is a cutting off from the poet's familiar world, and the sea is the visible power effecting and affirming the isolation. So the poet turns inward in some of the poems. The meaningful exploitation of the phonic resources of the language was a revelation. The collection was an anticipation of Navya poetry which burst on the literary scene in the early fifties.

L.S.S.R.

SAMUDRASNANA (Oriya), literally meaning sea-bathing, is a collection of Oriya poems by Guruprasad Mahanti, published in 1970. This is his second collection, the first being Nutana kavita (New poetry, 1955), and so far his latest. The book (which received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1973), contains nineteen poems including a sequence of ten sonnets, written over a period of twenty years.

The first ten poems in this collection deal with love. The mood throughout is ironic. Even the highly romantic sonnet 'Champaphula' is not free from irony; its conclusion is ambiguous. Love in these poems is not as simple an emotion as it is in conventional love poetry; it is imbued with complex feelings and ideas, and serves as an occasion for the poet's meditation on time-process. In 'Priya bandhabi', for example, the speaker invites his beloved to come to him on a moonlit night, but he also notes that the moon is tired and helpless, and his own mind is filled with a multitude of doubts and questions. The invitation ends with the highly suggestive image of the wreckage of the two lovers at the hands of Time, the high and mighty destroyer.

The poems like 'Harekrushna Das I and II', 'Picnic' and 'Kalapurusha' have as their theme the decay of the human civilisation in our times. The protagonist walks the city-streets and is appalled by the signs of decay visible everywhere. His life is confined to the world of gramophones, cameras and cigarettes carrying which he goes to the sea-beach on a picnic. But the experience leaves him with a still more oppressive realisation that all means and modes of salvation have been tried and found to be inadequate. In 'K' this sense of human inadequacy is dramatised in terms of certain situations borrowed from T.S. Eliot's The Waste Land. The mythic framework of the poem is taken from the Oriya Bhagabata by Jagannath Das. 'K' is a record of man's eternal quest for meaning, for transcendence. In 'Chhutira khara', 'Sidhua' and 'Keum ghasa keum balichara', the poet turns his attention from the city to the village. These poems contain some of the best descriptions in Oriya poetry of the natural beauty of rural Orissa. The sonnets are an example of the poet's consummate craftsmanship.

S.K.M.

SAMVAD (Rajasthani) is dialogue between characters; it may be a part of a book, or written independently as a short composition. Though it is an essential element of drama, it is found in both poetry and prose. Its importance, however, lies in independent compositions in this form of writing. The Jain authors have taken special interest in samvads because of their effective presentation of a situation or of a point of view. Here is a list of some short compositions (samvads) which appear in the catalogues of manuscripts, since practically none of them has been published so far: Soor Datar ro samvado by Barath Shankar, Moti kapasiya samvad by Hirkalash, Sonai nai lohar ro jhagado by Bhagwan Mahapattra (all three listed in Anup Sanskrit Library Catalogue); Chawal Bajari ro samvad, Bharathari samvad, Heer Ranjha samvad, Shuk samvad, Guralini jhagado, Sas-bahu samvad, etc. (listed in the catalogues of Chopasani Institute). Another form known as 'uttar paduttar' also belongs to this kind: Guru chela samvad is an example.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Raw.S.

SAMVADA (Sanskrit) means correspondence, that is similarity, in the poetic compositions of different poets. Rajashekhara plainly calls it harana (plagiarisation). Vamana was the first to distinguish between two types of poetic works: original (a-yoni, literally, having no source) and non-original (anya-chhaya-yoni, with its source in the impression of other's composition). Anandavardhana distinguishes three types of correspondences: (1) like reflections (pratibimba-vat), (2) like painted pictures (alekhya-vat), and (3) like resembling persons (tulya-dehi-vat). The first has no independent existence: the second has but a trite one; the third has independent existence. The poet should adopt the last. He need not be afraid of similarities; they are bound to occur. Acceptance of previously utilised themes or poetic elements will constitute no fault if they are imbibed with any variety of 'dhvani' (particularly rasa-dhvani) and appear, with a flash of imagination, rendered anew like the trees in spring.

Rajashekhara quotes many predecessors on the topic. Some say that it is difficult to find a theme untouched by an earlier poet, and one could only try to improve upon it. Vakpati-raja says: 'The verbal (i.e. poetic) activity, though continuously in operation throughout the world, still shines unabashed'. Some say one must study the compositions of other poets to see how similar ideas find different expressions and how they differ in shades and nuances. Others say that great minds think alike and concur in their import, so they should be studied to avoid concurrence. Rajashekhara opines: A great poet has no need to imitate. The poetic imagination sees things with its own eye. The poet's mind, like a mirror, reflects the entire universe. The goddess of learning herself chooses the words for him, which eagerly rush to his mind demanding expression.

Rajshekhara then describes three kinds of import: (1) having its source elsewhere, (2) having its source concealed, (3) having its source nowhere, i.e. which is original. The first is subdivided into (1) reflection identifiable in the object's qualities, (2) resemblance identifiable in qualities present in the object and (3) resemblance present in the existence of the quality in the object.

R.N.

SANADI, B.A. (Kannada; b. 1933). Belagavi Ahameda Saheba Sanadi secured the B.A. and the B.Ed. degrees of Karnataka University and the M.A. degree (in both Kannada and Sanskrit) of Shivaji University. Starting his official career as Social Education Officer, he later became Assistant Editor of Panchayati Raj Journal of Karnataka Government. Joining the Central Government Service as Field Publicity Officer in 1964, he is, at present, Extension Officer, All India Radio, Bombay.

Chiefly known as a poet, Sanadi has brought out twelve collections of poems. Ashakirana is a collection of sonnets. Sanadi has drawn the best from the poetical tradition of modern Kannada poetry and has written in the lyrical tradition of the Navodaya age. But rational and critical attitudes are evident, and this explains his wide appeal. He draws his images from a wide range of experiences of life. As a writer of short stories, he has revealed sensitiveness and an awareness of the complexity of modern life.

Sanadi's Taj Mahal, a collection of love poems, received the Bombay State Award, Dhruvabindu a national award, Pratibimba the Karnataka State Sahitya Akademy Award and Illi salluwaru (literary criticism), the Kavyananda Award. He is a member of the Karnataka State Sahitya Academy. His other poetry collections are Nelasampige, Himagiriya mudiyalli, Veerthankana, Saptaranga, Mambai male, Manem manege beli and Geetagunjana. His collections of short stories are Neerillada nalli and Anubhava. His critical works include Janakavya drishti and Illi salluvaru. He has also written a play, Neelambika.

Sanadi knows many languages, Kannada, Marathi, Urdu, English, Hindi and Sanskrit, among them.

L.S.S.R.

SANAI GOENBAB (Konkani; b.1877, d.1946), pen-name of Vaman Raghunath Varde Valavlikar, was born at Bichoim, Goa, and educated up to Matriculation. He could not afford University education and took up teaching English in Goa, then served as a clerk in Karachi Municipality and finally attained a high executive position in a German concern, Meister Lucius Brunia, Bombay. Differences of opinion with the management led to resignation of the job (1926). Thereafter, he decided to dedicate himself entirely to the cause of the Konkani language and literature and historical research, for which he worked ceaselessly for two succeeding decades.

One of his first works was a play in Marathi. A competent Maharashtrian, whom Valavlikar showed it, felt that though well-written its language was unauthentic and artificial. This remark made Valavlikar ask himself what his mother-tongue really was. Starting with the exploration of historical accidents that led to the dilution of the cultural heritage of Konkani people, he realised how they had forgotten their true identity. He adopted the pen-name of Sanai Goenbab, an expression otherwise derogatary to Konkanis, and took up a deep study of history, linguistics, folklore and philosophy in order to revitalise the Konkani language.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Of a score of his books in Konkani, Goenkaranchi Goen-am bhaill vosnuk (Settlement of Goans away from home, 1928), Valipattanacho sod (Discovery of Vallipattan, posthumously published, 1962) and Albukerkan Goen kasem jikhlem (How Albuquerque conquered Goa, also posthumously published, 1955) are of historical importance. An important finding of Sanai Goenbab is that the Rashtrakutas, who founded one of the great dynastic empires of India, originated from Lotli (Goa). Punyatmo Rama Kamati (1939), a biography of an eminent Goan of the 18th century, reveals how a man of prowess and intelligence is reduced to a withered flower for want of self-respect.

Sanai Goenbab's mission of instilling self-respect into his people was carried out on several fronts—history, grammar, linguistic controversy, philosophy, drama, etc. In Konkanichem nadsastra (Phonetics of Konkani, 1940) and Konkanichi vyakarani bandaval (The structure of Konkani, posthumously published 1949) he proves conclusively that Konkani is an independent language. Konkani bhasechem zait (Triumph of Konkani, 1930) and Yevkar Adhyakshanlem uloup (Speech of the Chairman of Reception Committee, 1945) are two books of polemic in which he dwells upon several aspects of the controversy over Konkani. Samsar butti (Flood, 1933), one of the two volumes of his philosophical treatise Gomantopanished, is his outstanding work. His Bhagvantalim git, translation of the Bhagavadgita, posthumously published (1959), is another remarkable book in which he meticulously avoids Sanskrit terminology. Even words like karma, tyaga, sanyasa have been rendered into simple Konkani colloquial words, without sacrificing the beauty or meaning of the original Sanskrit.

In the field of drama he contributed three full-length plays, Mogachem Lagn (1938), Povnachem Taplem (1948) and Zilba Rano (1950).

He was a progressive thinker, believed in communal unity, stood for the uplift of the lower classes of society, and upheld the advancement of women. An outstanding scholar, a prolific writer and a man of integrity, Sanai Goenbab lived ahead of his times, ironically remaining rather unknown except for his publisher and a few friends. His influence was felt only after his death, when three subsequent generations of Goans inspired by his message and writings steadily worked for furthering the cause of Konkani, and regarded him as the 'Father of modern Konkani literature and renaissance.'

SANAMAHI LAIKAN (Manipuri), i.e. Sanamahi, the saviour is a socio-cultural book of the Meiteis in ancient script, composed some time in the beginning of the 18th century. An edition of the book in current Bengali script and transliterated into modern Manipuri appeared first in 1972, edited by Oinam Bhogeswar Singh.

Sanamahi Laikan tells a mythical story of the birth of Sanamahi, the household deity of the Meiteis, born as a son of Maharaja Khagemba (1597-1652). When it became known that the king's son was an incarnation of Sanamahi, an idol was cast and the same worshipped. But during the reign of Maharaja Pamheiba (1709-1748) when the influence of neo-Vaishnavism spread far and wide in Manipur, the idol of Sanamahi was dismantled. The result of this desecration was complete chaos, and several riots broke out here and there. Under orders of the king, the idol was recast in 1733 by Nongyai Charakpamchangathi Aheiba and Kekru Shinheiba, which was formally installed by Shantidas Goshai, and its worship started again. Thereafter all forms of community worship and local festivities were amalgamated and fused into their Hindu counterparts. Even the local Yeks and Salais were given Hindu 'gotras'. From this fusion a new stream of Manipuri life and culture emerged.

The language of the book is archaic but not very difficult to understand. In the book there are Sanskrit words here and there, and an amalgam of indigenous words with Sanskrit makes good reading.

The name of the writer is not given. The book from a certain viewpoint could be considered a plea for the preservation of the indigenous faith. In the tradition of ancient compositions Sanamahi Laikan as a manuscript was copied by several pandits for their personal use. The present edition in current Bengali script with transliteration by Oinam Bhogeswar Singh into modern Manipuri enables it to reach out to larger number of readers.

I.R.B.S.

SANCHIYA HONNAMMA (Kannada; c. 1680) was one of the women poets in Kannada literature. It is learnt that she was employed under Yelandur Devajammanni, the queen of Chikkadevaraja Wadeyar of Mysore. Since the word 'sanchi' indicates a small bag meant to keep betel leaves, she was perhaps employed to keep betel leaf ready for her mistress. Though she was a maid servant under the queen, she claimed to be a disciple of Alasingararya, a court poet. On the recommendation of her teacher, the king asked Devajammanni to direct her maid servant Sanchi to write a work in Kannada. Accordingly, she wrote a work known as Hadibadeya dharma in sangatya metre. The word 'hadibade' is the corrupt form of 'pativrate'. Evidently, it is clear that the theme of the work is about the noble qualities of a virtuous wife. There are nine cantos consisting of 479 stanzas. Though the work does not deal with any definite story, we come across a number of stanzas which contain the essence of our ancient classics such as the Ramayana, the Mahabharata, the Bhagavata, and Manusmriti regarding the ideals and the responsibilities of a housewife. The author has taken much pains to depict the different duties of a woman who is destined to shoulder the responsibilities of a housewife. Though the work is didactic in spirit, Honnamma has tried her best to make it interesting by her simple style and relevant references to our ancient works in Sanskrit. Honnamma is quite conscious of the status of a woman in society. She questions boldly why people should feel discontented when a female child is born since it is the woman who plays the role of a mother. She asserts that a girl is as much an asset to a family as a boy, provided she is given proper opportunities to develop her abilities and personality.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Very recently scholars have evinced some interest in this work and its author. One noted critic doubts whether the work was written actually by her as its content reveals a good knowledge of sacred texts in Sanskrit. Some are of the opinion that she might have held a better position in the royal court. Some scholars have also raised doubts about her caste and marital status. Whatever may be the outcome of such debates, Honnamma's contribution to Kannada literature is unique in as much as she deals with the woman's status in family and society.

R.S.Mu.

SANDESARA, BHOGILAL JAYACHANDABHAI (Gujarati; b. 1917) was born and educated at Patan, capital of Gujarat in the medieval times. He is a scholar of Sanskrit, Prakrit, Apabhramsha and old Gujarati. A keen student of history, he did some historical research. He was Professor of Gujarati at the M.S. University of Baroda from 1951 to 1975, and Director of the Oriental Research Institute from 1958 to 1975. During this period, he was honorary editor of the Journal of the Institute and of the Gujarati quarterly Swadhyaya. In 1952, he delivered the famous Thakkar Vasanji lectures at the University of Bombay. In 1987 he was elected President of Gujarati Sahitya Parishad. Sandesara is also a scholar of Jain religion, and has studied the art and sculpture of India. He has also edited a few unpublished manuscripts of medieval Gujarati literature.

Among his researches in medieval Gujarati literature is Uttaradyayan sutra, an edition of a medieval Jain manuscript with notes and comments. Another Jain manuscript is Jyestiwal jati ane malla paran published by him with comments and notes. Prachin Gujarati sahityaman vritta rachana is a research work on the metres used in old and medieval Gujarati poetry. His Satarman sataknan prachin Gujarati kavyo is a compilation, along with commentary, of some hitherto unknown Gujarati poems of the seventeenth century. His Jain agam sahityaman Gujarati is a research on references to Gujarat in Jaina religious literature.

His research works in history are Itihas ni kedi and Vaghelaonun Gujarati; the latter gives us a glimpse of the socio-political and cultural life of Gujarat during the reign of Vaghela kings. Vastupal nun vidyamandal ane bija lekho gives us an account of the court of Vastupal, the medieval king of Gujarat, who was a connoisseur of art.

His Jagannath Puri and Orissanan puratan avashesho is a work on the old archeological remains of Jagannath Puri and Orissa, in which he has studied, from various angles, the old monuments and erotic postures in temple edifices.

Sandesara has toured widely in the east and the west to study the cultural heritage of different countries. An account of his tours may be found in his book Pradakshina (1962) which gives us many insights into the history and culture of the lands visited.

C.M.

SANDESARA, UPENDRARAI JAICHANDBHAI (Gujarati; b.1921) has had varied interests—Ayurvedic medicine, naturopathy, yoga, religion, stock market. A man of modest schooling, he was profoundly interested in reading religious books. He made a detailed study of the Mahabharata and prepared a cultural index of the epic, published under the title Bharat-ratna (1963). This earned him the Sri Aurobindo Award. He also made a deep study of the Bhagavat religion and Sikhism. He lectured on Sikhism at several institutions and universities, and his book on Sikh religion was published by Sardar Patel University in 1976. He has written nearly thirty-five books on religion and the Ayurvedic system of medicine. His major works are Mahabharat aur Uttaradhyansutra, Bharat-ratna, Sikhdharma darshan, Shri Krishna: Purushottam aur antaryami.

P.V.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

SANDESH KAVYA (HINDI)

SANDESH KAVYA (Hindi) is a poetic form wherein a lover sends his message of love and longing to the beloved through a messenger, generally a natural object like a cloud, a swan, or a beetle. There is a long tradition of this kavya in Sanskrit beginning with Kalidas's Meghaduta and going through the works of Apabhramsha poets. Hindi literature itself has a rich tradition of this kind of poetry. In the Sufi poet Malik Muhammad Jayasi's Padmavat, Ratnasen sends his message of love to Padmavati through a parrot, named Hiraman. In the same poem queen Nagamati requests the beetle and the crow to take her message to king Ratnasen. In Tulsidas's Ramacharitmanas, Hanuman serves as Rama's messenger to Sita in Lanka.

The Krishna-bhakti poetry in Hindi presents a unique example of 'sandesh kavya'. Surdas gave a new dimension to it in his Bhramargita. The theme of Krishna's message to the gopis in Braja comes from the tenth chapter of Shrimad Bhagawat in which Uddhava serves as the Lord's messenger. The message brought by him is not an emotional message from a lover for the gopis. Rather, it is a message of 'knowledge' delivered by a learned Uddhava, a 'Jnanyogi', who tries to preach to the gopis the doctrine of detachment, the worthlessness of worldly objects, and the essence of the Nirguna Brahma. The message does not go far with the love-intoxicated gopis. Surdas's poem not only serves to depict the pain and anguish of the gopis in their separation from Lord Krishna but also brings out the supremacy of Bhakti over Knowledge, of the 'Saguna' over the 'Nirguna'. The poet's 'message', as against the 'message' of Uddhava, is communicated not in the form of dry logic but through a poetic mode which is emotionally vibrant and can be sung as 'kirtan' with the notes of classical ragas and raginis of Indian music. The innovations by Surdas were a landmark in the tradition of 'sandesh kavya'. The symbol of the beetle was so effective that it became almost a convention among the Krishna bhakta poets to write 'Bhramargita'. All the sarcasm and irony directed towards Krishna's messanger Uddhava is subtly pointed towards 'Madhukar', the beetle, who is described in terms of close resemblance to Krishna both in complexion and in temperament. The fellow poets of 'Ashtachhap'—Nandadas, Paramanandadas, Krishnadas, Chaturbhujadas and Govindaswami—wrote similar sandesh kavyas under the title Bhramargita (or Bhanwargita). Among them Nandadas's Bhanwargit deserves special mention for its wit and irony. Tulsidas also wrote some verses in the Bhramargit tradition in his Krishnagitawali. Later on, Mukundadas and Raskhan also contributed to the tradition. The Uddhava-Gopi dialogue became so popular with the poets of the medieval age that poets like Rahim and Senapati also wrote some 'Barvai' and 'Kavitta' on this theme. All the prominent poets of the Ritikal were charmed by it. Matiram's Lalita lalama and Matiram satasai used the sandesh kavya tradition as a medium for analysing the 'alankaras' (figures of speech). Dev, Alam, Ghananand and Padmakar found the form suitable enough to represent their emotive as well as expressionistic capabilities.

With a change in poetic sensibility, the modern age added new dimensions to the sandesh kavya tradition. The mythical characters of Radha, Krishna, gopis, Rama and Sita have taken on new meanings in the light of the Renaissance and the social and national awakening. The pioneer of modern Hindi literature, Bharatendu Harishchandra, linked 'Uddhava-Gopi samvad' to this new awakening. Later, in Satyanarayan Kaviratna's Bhramarduta the message to Krishna is sent by mother Yashoda through beetle, and so the, mesage is no more limited to the lover-beloved communication. In Ayodhya Singh Upadhyay Hariaudh's Priya pravas, Radha sends her message to Krishna through wind. In this 'pavanduti prasang' the whole context is impersonalised, and it is not the agony of the beloved but her social concern that dominates the scene. From Krishna's side Uddhava comes to the gopis with the message of service to the nation.

Jagannathdas Ratnakar's Uddhava shatak is an important contribution to the sandesh kavya tradition of 'Bhramargita'. Based on the old Nirguna-Saguna debate the treatment of the theme reflects the spirit of modern logic and reason. Maithilisharan Guptas's Dwapar also tries to add modern sensibility to the Uddhava-Gopi dialogue. Among other important writings in the tradition can be named Ramashankar Shukla Rasal's Uddhavashatak, Dwaraka Prasad Mishra's Krishnayana, Lala Haradayal's Udho pachisi, and Jagannath Sahay's Krishnasagar.

Apart from the 'Bhramargita' tradition there can be seen other trends in the sandesh kavya of the modern era. Ram Naresh Tripathi's works Milan, Pathik and Swapna add other elements to this kavya—national service and love of nature. The new form of sandesh kavya may be seen in the lyrics, in the form of letters, in Maithilisharan Gupta's Patravali (or Patrakavya) and Nirala's Chhatrapati Shivaji ke patra. Janardan Jha Dwij has also written Tootahar under the influence of Maithilisharan Gupta's 'Shakuntala ka patra lekhan'.

In addition to these poetic works, we have a number of translations of Meghaduta in Hindi. These translations have played an important role in the tradition of Hindi sandesh kavya. Raja Lakshaman Singh, Thakur Jagmohan Singh, Rai Deviprasad Poorna and Lala Sitaram have translated Meghaduta into Brajabhasha. Poorna's translation under the title Dharadhardhawan became very popular with the readers. Later on, Lakshmidhar Vajpeyi, Kanhaiyalal Poddar, Keshava Prasad Mishra and Nagarjuna translated it into Khariboli Hindi.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

K.P.

SANDESHAKAVYA (Malayalam). Kalidasa's Meghaduta has been limited and translated many times in Malayalam literature. More than twenty translations have appeared so far; the first in the series was written by A.R. Raja Raja Varma (1863-1918). The pioneer attempt to write a sandeshakavya was made in the early half of the fourteenth century. The most notable poem in this genre during that period was Unnunilisandesham. Scholars are of different opinion regarding the author of Unnunilisandesham. Though it is a matter of dispute among scholars, many people approve the view that it was written by the king of Vatakkumkur (a royal family of South Kerala), and that the bearer of the sandesha was Sarvanganatha Aditya Varma, the king of Venag. The kavya is divided into two parts, 'Purva' and 'Uttara', together containing 247 verses. The lover, while he was asleep, along with his beloved in her house, is abducted by a jealous 'Yakshi' (female spirit). During the flight, when they reach Trivandrum, he is roused from sleep by the hymns heard from the temple. He understands that he is away from his beloved and in his anger he curses the Yakshi. She drops him there in the temple premises. There he meets Aditya Varma, the king of Trippapur. The love-lorn hero sends his message through Aditya Varma to the heroine, who lives in Katutturutti. The route, the premises of her residence, the actual mesage, etc. have been described in the second half of the kavya. The 'mandakranta' verses are in beautiful manipravala style. As a literary piece and as a text which throws light on the history of the land and its language, Unnunilisandesham is a commendable poetical work.

Another anonymous dutakavya, Kokasandesham (Chakravakasandesham) of the fourteenth century is also worth mentioning. The text is not complete, but its beauty lies in the versification. During the spring season, a lover happens to be removed from the bed of his spouse to a distant garden by some supernatural sky-traveller. The sorrowful lover fortunately meets a 'chakravaka' bird, and through the bird he sends a message to his spouse. The manipravala text contains eighty-four verses in mandakranta metre. Both these texts Unnunilisandesham and Chakravakasandesham are written as dream poems; they are coloured deep with romantic touches, and their versification is excellent. Bhringasandesham, a more recent piece, is written by Raman Ezhuttacchan of the fourteenth century, according to the formula of a dutakavya. In all these works the reason for separation does not seem rational; but as literary pieces they are highly readable.

Perhaps, the most popular and renowned work is Mayurasandesham (Peacock message) of Kerala Varma Valiya Koil Tampuran who was undoubtedly a versatile genius and a person who inaugurated the modern era in Malayalam literature. The story behind this kavya is real, taken from the poet's own personal experience. At the age of thirty, Kerala Varma was jailed by the displeased king Ayilyam Tirunal, at a far-off place from the abode of his wife, Lakshmi Bai. During the imprisonment he was allowed to worship in the Subrahmanya temple at Haripad. There he saw a beautiful peacock, the mount of the Lord, through whom he sent a message to the love-lorn spouse at Trivandrum. The poem is written in a short span of sixty-seven days; it contains 141 fine verses in mandakranta metre. Mayurasandesham is a landmark in Malayalam poetry. The historical fact combined with emotional fervour and charming diction made the work so popular that the verses were at the tip of the common man's tongue for a long period. As an example of the heart-felt narration, a verse is quoted here:

> Once while alone hunting birds in the park
> O blue-eyed one, I happened to kill a bird
> Out of pity for his bereaved companion close by
> Did you not, o, timid one, ask me to kill her too!

The subjective element and the lyrical note are clearly heard throughout the poem.

There are many published or unpublished sandeshakavyas in Malayalam. Some notable ones are: Atmasandesham (1891) by Chelayil Krishnan Elayatau, Hamsa sandesham (1896) by Kotungallur Kunjikuttan Tampuran, Datyuhasandesham (1897) by Siviolli Narayanan Namboodiri, Kokilasandesham (1905) by Mulur S. Padmanabha Panicker, Garuda sandesham (1907) by M. Rajarajavarma, Chakorasandesham (1913) by K. Lakshmi Amma, Katakasandesham by Otuvil Kunjikrishna Menon (1870-1916), Pikasandesham (1918) by K. Raman Pillai, Kapotasandesham by Kottarattil Sankunni, Bhupasandesham (1934) by K.M. Paniker, Sharikasandesham by Rama Varma Appan Tampuran (1876-1942) and Indirasandesam (1958) by K. Raghavan.

This list will show the wealth of dutakavya literature in Malayalam. But not all of them can claim literary excellence; they are only poems conceived in the formula of dutakavya.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: N. Krishna Pillai, Kairaliyute katha (Kottayam, 1975); K. Appukuttan Nair, Sandesakavyangal: oru pathanam

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

(Kottayam, 1980); K. Ayyappa Paniker, A Short History of Malayalam Literature (Department of Public Relations, 1977); Ullur S. Parameshwara Iyer, Kerala sahitya charitram (Trivandrum, 1968).

V.S.S.

SANDESHAKAVYA (Sanskrit), also known as Dutakavya, is a popular sub-genre of Sanskrit lyric poetry. The poem is so called because an imaginative poet describes here some message of love despatched to an estranged lover or beloved through a messenger, animate, inanimate or abstract. The literary antecedent of the idea of sending messages through an animal may be traced back to the tenth mandala of the Rigveda (X. 108) in which a bitch called Sarama is sent to the Panis as a messenger of the gods. As the later poets became increasingly aware of the immense creative possibilities of the motif, it found its way into the puranas and the great epics. Thus we find Nala sending his message of love to Damayanti through a swan and Rama sending Hanuman, the famous ape, to Sita as his emissary. It is now generally agreed that the idea of Rama's sending a message of love and consolation to estranged Sita may have inspired Kalidasa to compose his lyrical gem, Meghaduta, the first and foremost among the sub-genre of sandeshakavya. The great master has himself alluded to the motif depicted in the Ramayana in the following manner: 'ityakhyate pavanatanayam maithilivonmukhi sa'.

The popularity of Kalidasa's Meghaduta was so unquestionable that in course of time the composition of sandeshakavya became almost a passport for the later poets to the citadel of glory. In the post-Kalidasa Sanskrit literature, therefore, we find a host of sandeshakavyas numbering more than fifty of which only a few possess real literary merit. This is, in fact, due to a general tendency discernible in a less creative epoch which produces imitative works. Some of these poetasters were at best industrious versifiers, while a majority of them were no better than transcribers. Indeed, only a few of them were aware of the exacting demands of poetic composition as genuine manifestation of creativity; their efforts were exhausted in utilising the original form and theme of the sandeshakavya in as many different ways as possible. These versifiers were hardly keen about a really innovative treatment of the compositional structure. They only tried to follow Kalidasa as faithfully as possible; that is why the 'mandakranta' metre employed in the Meghaduta continues in the later sandeshakavyas as well. However, some other metres were used in a few exceptional cases, such as 'shikharini' in Rupa Goswami's Hamsaduta and Vrajanatha's Manoduta, 'vasantatilaka' in Vishnudasa's Manoduta and Harihara's Hridayaduta, 'malini' in Jambu's Chandraduta, and 'shardulavikridita' in Pikaduta and Bholanatha's Panthaduta.

Kalidasa employed a cloud on the first day of the month of 'ashadha' as a messenger of the love-lorn Yaksha to his spouse languishing in the city of Alaka. But this unique display of poetic imagination was not grasped in its proper perspective by the later poets and hence Kalidasa's famous poetic justification 'Kamartah hi prakritikripanashchetanachetaneshu' became a misconstrued excuse for them in employing not only inanimate objects, birds and animals but also abstract and mythological objects as messengers. The catalogue of such messengers includes the wind, moon, footprints, tulasi plant, parrot, cuckoo, bee, swan, peacock, chakora, chataka, chakravaka, Uddhava, Hanuman, mind, devotion, etc. Because of their innate unreality, it was but natural that such messengers would traverse mostly along imaginary routes, and therefore we can hardly expect any dependable topographical account of India from those extraordinary emissaries. Such sandeshakavyas were fashioned mostly on the famous stories of Rama and Sita, Krishna and Radha, but gradually the sub-genre also encompassed the exploits of some religious and historical personages like Parshvanatha, Neminatha, Lakshmanasena, etc. As time passed on, the predominant emotion of love no longer occupied the centre-stage and gave way to devotional feelings and tranquillity in such a manner that these poems turned out to be nothing but descriptive Vijnapti-patras. These literary pursuits were exercises in futility culminating into artificiality, verbosity, suffocation of form itself and straining of language. Thus the creative essence of the sandeshakvya was choked, for example, in sending the progress report by a disciple about his religious activities to the preceptor residing in a distant land. Such a process reached the height of absurdity, as it were, when a devotee sought to send the swan of his mind with an abstract philosophical message to his beloved, Bhakti, residing in the imaginary world of Shiva. On another plane, we are confronted with a sort of apology for sandeshakavya in Kakaduta, since its form stoops so low as to produce a parody. There an imprisoned brahmin of disgraceful character seeks to send a crow as his messenger to the source of his infatuation, i.e Kadambari (drink.)

Kalidasa's Meghaduta was not only responsible for inspiring the later sandeshakavyas, but it also led to the composition of a few sequels to it which are known as 'pratisandeshas', i.e., the counter-message of the Yaksha's spouse. Thus we come across Yakshollasa written by Krishnamurti (17th c.) who calls himself 'Abhinavakalidasa', Meghapratisandesha by Mandikal Ramashastri, Ghanavritta by Korada Ramachandra, Yakshamilanakavya by

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Mahamahopadhyaya Parameshvara Jha of Mithila, and Hamsasandesha by Bhatta Vamana. Another interesting literary phenomenon is the adoption of the trick of 'samasyapurana' by some later poetasters who were so much lured by the enchanting poetry of Meghaduta that they chose to incorporate one or two of its lines into their own verses. Usually, the fourth pada of Kalidasa's verses was interwoven to make up the samasyas or riddle and then the versifiers sought to compose the rest themselves to show off their supposed calibre in workmanship. This inevitably led to a chaotic situation as artificality was rampant throughout, culminating into the smothering of whatever poetry was left. Among such works we have Meghadutasamasyalekha written by Meghavijaya, Shiladuta by Charitrasundaragani, Nemiduta by Vikrama, Pashvabhyudaya by Jinasena, Chimanicharita by Nilakantha, etc.

In the final analysis, it hardly requires any explanation that Kalidasa's Meghaduta is the roof and crown of this sub-genre of sandeshakavyas. In fact, for 'lofty conception, artistic design, aesthetic sentiment, delicate embellishment and graceful expression,' the poem has no parallel in Sanskrit literature. Rightly, therefore, the connoisseurs of poetic art regard it as a monument of letters. But the later poets while scrambling for easy success could not come anywhere near the epi-centre of the sub-genre. Therefore, except two or three works, those sandeshakavyas were bound to be as far removed from Meghaduta as Hyperion was from Satyr.

For a selective catalogue of the post-Kalidasa sandeshakavyas please refer to Dutakavyas, Vol. II of the Encyclopaedia.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.B. Keith, A History of Sanskrit Literature (Oxford, 1966); A.K. Warder, Indian Kavya Literature (Delhi, 1969); C.H. Chakraborty, Indian Historical Quarterly, Vol. iii; C. Kunhan Raja, Survey of Sanskrit Literature (Bombay, 1962); M. Krishnamachariar, History of Classical Sanskrit Literature (Delhi, 1974); M. Winternitz, A History of Indian Literature, Vol. iii (Delhi, 1967); S.K. De, History of Sanskrit Literature (Calcutta, 1947).

Ta.B.

SANDESHAKAVYA (Tamil), The generic terms, 'tootu' in Tamil and duta kavya or sandeshakavya in Sanskrit refer to a kind of poem which deals with a message. Unlike the Sanskrit sandeshakavya, in Tamil, tootu is considered a sub-category of prabandha which is now popularly known as 'chirrilakkiyam'. The literary motif of sending message of love extends from the days of Tolkappiyam and Sangam literature. In chapter Karpiyal of Tolkappiyam Porulatikaram, Tolkappiyar talks about literary situations known as Vayilkal (sending messenger) and gives a list of people who are qualified to go as messengers of love in Akam poetry. It may not be wrong to say that the poems in the Sangam literature anthologies under the motif of 'Kamam mikka kalipatarkilavi' are the model for tootu literature in Tamil. These poems express the agony of a lover and his anguish on separation from his beloved to even inanimate things. In Akananuru, the heroine sends a crane as her messenger of love (Akam. 170). In one of the poems of Kuruntogai (266), the heroine complains to her lady companion that her beloved has forgotten to send her a message even through the birds. Here sending message through birds is referred to as 'pulvayt tootu'. In Narrinai, there are poems in the format of sending crane (54,70), parrot and honey-bee (102,207) as messengers of love. In Ainkurunuru (317), the heroine is waiting for the return of her soul which has gone as messenger of love to her beloved who has deserted her for the sake of material benefit. Not only in the poems of Akam literature but also in the poems of Purananuru, the motif of sending the messenger is used in a different context. The Puram poem (67) is in the form of a dialogue between the poet and a male swan. Here the poet Pichirantaiyar tells the swan that if it visits the palace of his friend, the Chola king Koperuncholan, he would definitely bestow presents on him for his service.

In the Bhakti period, the motif of sending a messenger was handled effectively by Nayanmars and Alwars, the saint poets of Tamilnadu. In the 'patikam' of Tonipuram, Tirunanasampantar sends a honey-bee as his messenger to Lord Shiva who is the presiding deity at the temple of Tonipuram. Antal, in her Nachchiyar tirumoli (8:577-586), sends clouds as her messenger of love to Lord Venkateshwar. In Tiruvoymoli also, Nammalvar sends not only the clouds but also the koel, the stork, the honey-bee, the swan, the parrot and many other creatures belonging to the family of birds (1:4, 6:1, 9:7), with a love message.

At one level, the Tamil tradition of 'message poem' in the form of lyric poetry was alive and still popular up to the 16th century. At another level, the Sanskrit tradition of duta kavya or sandesha kavya also entered Tamil literature and enjoyed popularity as a sub-category of minor poetic work which has its own independent generic form. The poet of Chattimurram, who is away from his beloved wife, spending a night in the city hall of the Pandya king Valuti, sends a stork as his messenger to tell his wife about his pitiable condition in an alien land. This is one of those beautiful sandesha poems written in the lyric tradition of Sangam literature in the anthology of Purananuru by Pichrantaiyan. Umapathy Sivachariyar's Nenchuvitu tootu (The soul as messenger) was the first work in Tamil on the model of sandeshakavya of Sanskrit tradition. Here the poet sends his soul as messenger to Lord Shiva, and the work reflects Shaiva Siddhanta philosophy. In 14th century, the grammarians of 'Pattiyal' works started formulating the poetic theory of tootu literature. According to Pattiyal works, tootu literature ought to be composed only in the metre of kalivenba. Now more than sixty works are available in Tamil. Among them, the best one is Tamilvitu tootu (Tamil as messenger) in which the poet sends Tamil to Lord Shiva. The poets of the 18th and 19th centuries send even objects like slipper, paddy, money and tobacco-leaf as messengers and deviate from the norms of sandeshakavya set by Pattiyal works.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Kamil Veith Zvelelil, Tamil Literature (Otto Harrassowitz, Weisbaden, 1974).

C.Ra.

SANDESHAKAVYA (Telugu) is a poem which communicates a message (sandesha), usually between two lovers separated from each other, sent through a messenger (duta). Though primarily meant to convey the pangs of separation, these kavyas also offer the description of places that the messenger has to pass through in order to reach the destination. Gradually, the scope of sandesha kavyas widened, giving the poet freedom to choose the subject of his choice to convey it either to some other individual or to God himself. Poetry in sandesha kavyas is lyrical in nature.

Kalidasa's Meghaduta is considered to be the first sandesha kavya. Apart from the translations of Kalidasa, we have in Telugu Chakora sandeshamu (Message of chakora) by Moturu Venkata Rao and Shashi dutamu (Moon's message) by Visvanadha Satyanarayana. Gurram Jashua exhibited novelty by selecting a bat as messenger in his Gabbilamu (Bat). He sent a message to the Lord through a bat describing the problems of society and pleading for a better social order.

R.S.R.

SANDESHA RASAKA (Gujarati/Rajasthani) is a sandesh kavya by Abdalla Rahman, an Arab, written towards the end of the 12th century. The poem was appended by Acharya Hemachandra to his Siddha Hema-Vyakaran as an illustrative example of changes in language—an instance of Apabhramsha developing into various regional languages like old Gujarati and Rajasthani in the 12th century. Besides, its linguistic importance, the poem is significant as a sandesh kavya with Kalidasa's Meghaduta as its prototype. The poem is also significant as it has been written not by an Indian but an Arab, Abdalla Rahman, a weaver, who lived on the western border of India. The poet mentions a few places in the poem: (1) Multan, famous for its sun temple, now in Pakistan; (2) Khambat, a prosperous city of Gujarat under the rule of the Vaghelas; (3) Vijayanagar or Vikrampur in the Jaisalmer division of Rajasthan. From the description of these cities it seems that the poem was written some time towards the end of the 12th century. It is composed in 223 verses in matra metres as well as some varna vrittas, and is an excellent example of Apabhramsha developing into regional languages of the time.

The subject of the poem is slender. The heroine, who lives at Vikrampur, is separated from her husband who has long been away to Khambat in search of fortune. She conveys her pangs of separation through a messenger from Multan on his way to Khambat. The poet gives a beautiful description of the heroine: a lovely woman, forlorn and grief-stricken, with the gait of a swan, tears rolling down her cheeks, beseeches the wayfarer to take her message to her lover. She describes to him the anguish of her soul in eight 'gattas' and then asks him where he was coming from. The traveller tells her that he came from Samor (Shambpur) where the learned men recited the mantras of the Vedas, the stage actors enacted the 'rasakas' or narrated the episodes from the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, and that his town was originally called Mulsthan (now Multan). He further told her that his master had sent him as a messenger to Khambat (today's Khambat, Skambhadítya in Sanskrit). Hearing the name of Khambat she trembled like a banana tree in the grip of strong wind and burst into tears, but soon she regained her composure and said, 'My strength drains out at the mention of Khambat, for my husband is right in the city. He is so heartless that he has not come home for a long time.' She would like to send him a message. The wayfarer asked her to be short and quick as he had to go a long way and had no time to sit down and write her message. She would better tell him orally. The heroine said: At one time even the necklace round her neck was no hindrance to her embrace but now the sea and the rivers, the mountains and trees and castles separate her from her lover.

The poet gives elaborate description of her pangs of separation from the beloved all through the six seasons of the year, reminding one of Kalidasa's Ritusamhara. At the end of her message she says: 'Oh, wayfarer, if because of my intense suffering I have used any harsh or inappropriate words, kindly replace them with polite and proper ones. Tell my lover about my plight in a way that he does not feel hurt'.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

As the wife turns back after seeing the traveller off and looks southward, she spots her lover approaching towards her. Her joy knows no bound. Her fondest desire is suddenly fulfilled and she blesses those who recite and hear the poem and prays that their desires be also fulfilled (stanza 222).

The poet concludes the last stanza (223) with a prayer: Glory be to God who has no beginning and no end.

The dominant sentiment of the poem is separation in love. Conforming to the tradition of Indian poetics, the poet unites the hero and the heroine together and ends the poem on a happy note.

The poet calls this poem a 'rasaka', describing it as Saneha rasaka (Sandesha rasaka in Sanskrit). 'Rasaka' is a lower category of an allegorical poem and, according to Vagbhatta, it is meant to be sung by a group of dancers. It has a large number of rhymes and rhythms appropriate for soft but brisk singing. The oldest poem of this type is said to be by Jinadattasuri in Apabhramsha, as quoted by the Sanskrit commentator Jinapala Upadhyaya. The variety of metres used in 'sandesha rasaka' is, indeed, astounding.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jinavijaya Muni and Harivallabh Bhayani, Sandesha rasaka (Bombay, 1945); K.K. Shastri, Apana kavio, Part I (Ahmedabad, 1978).

K.K.S.

SANDHI BANDHA (Apabhramsha) is a major genre in the narrative poetry peculiar to Apabhramsha literature, and to some extent it corresponds to the Sanskrit mahakavya. The sandhi form was used in Apabhramsha for larger poems of epic and puranic proportions, as also for shorter poems for legendary or fictional biography. We have epics and puranas in this literary form, all written by the Jainas, although there is evidence enough to believe that similar works, now lost, were composed also in the Vedic-Brahmanic tradition.

Form and structure: The sandhi-bandha had a well defined and highly structured form. It consisted of a number of major units, called sandhi. The sandhi was to divide the subject-matter of a poem into convenient sections or chapters, and it corresponded to the 'sarga' of the Sanskrit mahakavya. The number of sandhis ranged from a dozen to a few dozens for the shorter type, and from several dozens to a hundred for the larger type.

Each sandhi was made up of a number of shorter units called kadavaka. The kadavaka can be looked upon as a verse paragraph treating a single topic. The number of kadavakas in a sandhi ranged from a dozen to three or four dozens.

Each kadavaka had two or three structural parts: (1) The opening piece (adi-ghatta). It was optional; it introduced the topic and consisted of one stanza, simple or complex (i.e. made up of several different metrical units), in a metre (or metres) different from that of the main body of the kadavaka.

(2) The main body of the kadavaka: It developed the topic through narration or description. It was composed in a standard narrative metre. It had eight rhyming couplets as a norm, but there was considerable variation or flexibility in this matter. Later works tended to have longer kadavakas, though even then the preference for not straying far from the norm persisted. (3) The closing piece was called 'ghatta' 'dhruva' or 'dhruvaka' (burden): It concluded the topic on hand and indicated the topic that followed. It consisted of a single stanza in a metre shorter than that used for the principal part of the kadavaka. A large variety of metres were used for this purpose.

The metre used for each of the three parts of the kadavaka was to be the same for that part for all the kadavakas of a particular sandhi. For the sake of variation, however, occasionally there could be a sandhi with the main body of its kadavakas in different metres. Each sandhi was headed by a stanza in that metre in which all the ghattas of its kadavakas were composed.

The Apabhramsha narrative poems were meant to be sung before an audience. Their musical character explains the peculiarities of the formal structure noted above. There is clear evidence to show that at times classical melodies (raga, varna, bhasha) were also used in their presentation.

Subject-matter and treatment: The sandhi-bandha was used for (1) the vast themes of traditional epics and puranas, viz., the Ramayana (e.g. Svayambhu's Paumachariya), the Mahabharata or Harivamsha purana (e.g. the Harivamsha purana of Svayambhu, Dhavala, etc.), the lives of sixty-three Great Men (Shalakapurusha, mahapurusha) of mythology collectively (e.g. Pushpadanta's Mahapurana); (2) the aggregate of illustrative tales (Kathakosha) associated with some religious works (e.g. Shrichandra's Kahakosa); (3) the shorter themes of the biographies of the Jaina saints, pontiffs, etc. (e.g. Padmakirti's Pasa-purana, Vira's Jambusami-chariya), or of heroes of religious legends and tales (e.g. Pushpadanta's Jasaharachariya, Sadharana's Vilasavaikaha, Dhahila's Pauma Sirichariya, Dhanapala's Bhavisattakaha) or themes of a shorter Kathakosa (e.g. Harisena's Dhammaparikkha, Amarakirti's Chakkammuvaeso).

Even though these were narrative themes, involving a number of characters, episodes and a large sequence of events, the treatment was predominantly rhetorical and descriptive. As most of these myths, legends and tales were quite well known in the tradition in all their details, and as they were frequently recounted in earlier works, we find that in the sandhi bandha the matter was always subordinated to the manner. The poets concentrated on ornate descriptions and depiction of sentiments. Of course, the Sanskrit mahakavya, which was imitated by one and all, also had much to do with this tradition of style and mode of expression.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Achievement and later developments: As the sandhi-bandha has been used in Apabhramsha literature for more than eight hundred years, the number of such works is very large. Many works are lost, and of the preserved ones only a few have been published so far. They impress us by their literary and technical qualities and rank with some of the best works in Sanskrit and Prakrit poetry.

The strength and vitality of the sandhi form is amply borne out by the later developments. Towards the end of the twelfth century when the new forms in the Indo-Aryan literature were rising, a new type of short poems in several branches of Apabhramsha began to be composed. These poems, called 'sandhi', consisted of one sandhi only. Further, the sandhi form was inherited by the new Indo-aryan literature also, and it continued to be used by the different forms of Apabhramsha for several centuries. The Premakhyanaka poems and the Ramacharitmanasa of Tulsidas in early Avadhi and the Akhyana poems (with the kadavaka structure) in early Gujarati are well known examples illustrating this point.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.D. Velankar (ed.), Svayambhuchhanda (Jodhpur, 1962); Chhandonushassna (Jodhpur, 1962); L. Alsdorf (ed.), Harivamsha purana (Hamburg, 1936); H.C. Bhayani (ed.), Apabhramsha vyakaran (Bombay, 1960); R.M. Shah (ed.), Samdhikavya-samuchchaya (Ahmedabad, 1980).

H.C.B.

SANDHIAR SUR (Assamese) is a book of mystic poetry, the best of its kind in Assamese, written by the Sahitya Akademi Award winner poetess, Nalinibala Devi (1898-1977). Immediately after its publication in 1928 Nalinibala became popular with the lovers of poetry in Assam. Although the poetess was the daughter of a great patriot, Nabinchandra Bordoloi, she did not receive formal schooling as women's education was not in vogue in Assam at that time. However, she had the best 'ashramite' type of education at home under the care of her illustrious father. In her childhood she read the Gita and the Upanishads that formed the basis of her life of faith and spiritualism. Besides, she had the tragic experience of losing her husband in the prime of her life, and the tragedy became all the more intense with the death of her two children. She turned to a life of spiritual dedication which gave her a sense of radiant faith in the Life Eternal.

Sandhiar sur (Evening songs) may be taken as a spiritual regeneration of Nalinibala from the illusion (maya) of the earthly life. In a letter written by her on 28 June 1977 the poetess says, 'By the grace of God through sincerest spiritual pursuit I have gained some measure of a profound mystic experience of the Eternal life. Indeed, there is nothing perishable in the beautiful universe, the Creator of which is all beautiful (Chira sundara). And this conviction of the poetess finds expression in a series of forty melodious lyrics of the book. Of these the most popular are: 'Anahuta' (Uninvited), 'Sachane' (Is it true?), 'Pahara sapon' (Lost dream), 'Shesharghya' (Last offering), 'Param trishna' (Thirst eternal), 'Milon' (Union), 'Nawaria' (Boatman), 'samadhi' (Ultimate union), 'Achin pakhi' (Unknown bird), 'Bhagarua' (The fatigued), 'Puva' (Morning), 'Yatra' (Journey), 'Para parat' (On the other shore), 'Bin' (Lyre), 'Kon tumi' (Who art thou?), 'Keteki' (The Indian nightingale), 'Putali' (her dead son), 'Janambhumi' (Motherland), 'Purnima' (Full moon) and 'Satya pathik' (Voyage to truth).

An innate faith in the Vedanta philosophy makes the poet realise the abiding presence of God everywhere in the universe. Even when she does not pray, the Lord gives her His blessings, and when she has spiritual realisation, she feels the omnipresence of God and wants to be united with Him through her last offering of Death ('Shesh arghya'). She prays to Him to lead her on through the desert of life ('Shesh biksha'). Only on attainment of the Ultimate Reality, there shall be neither life nor death. The quest of man for eternal joy is Eternal Beautiful (Chira sundara):

"If enjoyment could have brought satiety,
Desires could not have existed;
If the soul of man merged in the Eternal,
Life and Death would sink into nothingness.
The endless thirst for beauty in mortal eyes,
The endless desire for happiness in the world
Are but the desire for Eternal Joy
And eternal thirst for All Beautiful. ('Param trishna')

The last poem 'Satya pathik' (Voyage to truth) reasserts the part of man in his pursuit of Life Eternal:

True you are,
Eternal you are,
There is neither fear nor death,
On you go, on you go.

Apart from mystical faith, Nalinibala also reveals a sense of patriotic fervour in her poems. Take for example her poem 'Janambhumi' (Motherland). She wants to be reborn in her poor motherland and serve her by singing as a bird, by extolling her green beauty, by spreading fragrance in the breeze, by washing the feet of her motherland as a river, and by casting the radiance of laughter like a golden patch of cloud on the pale lips of her motherland:

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The poor man's hut
Is a pilgrimage
A hermitage of virtue,
When I am dead
Let me be born again
In my country that is poor.

A few poems like 'Nawaria', 'Achin pakhi', 'Bin', 'Puva', 'Keteki', 'Purnima' are fine odes, combining the delineation of nature's beauty with mystic thoughts. The poem 'Putali' is one of the best elegiac poems ever written in Assamese. The poetess does not mourn the loss of her dear son Putali, but cherishes the hope of her reunion with him in the Life Eternal.

The great poetess of Sandhiar sur was honoured with 'Padmashri' in 1957, and with a Sahitya Akademi Award in 1968 for her book of poems Alakananda (1967).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Maheswar Neog, Asamiya sahityar ruprekha (Guahati, 1962); Satyendranath Sarma, Asamiya sahityar itibritta (Gauhati, 1959).

Pu.S.

SANDHU, GULZAR SINGH (Punjabi; b. 1935) was born at Kotla Badla, district Ludhiana, his mother's native place. His family hails from the village of Soni in Hoshiarpur district. Both from the father's side and the mother's side, he draws upon a lineage of Jagirdars or fief-holders from the time of the Sikh rule, but by no means aristocrats in worldly possessions. Sandhu did his B.A. from the Khalsa College, Mahilpur, in 1953, and later did his M.A. in English Literature from the Punjab University. He migrated to Delhi and secured an editorial job in the well-known Punjabi monthly, Pritam. Later, he switched over to a sub-editor's job in the Punjabi section of the Publications Division of the Indian Council of Agricultural Research. Presently, he is working as Director (Public Cooperation) in the Ministry of Rural Development.

He has four collections of short stories to his credit, entitled Husan de haani (Peers of beauty, 1962), Ik sanjh purani (An old association, 1965), Sone di itt (A brick of gold, 1970) and Amar katha (Immortal story, 1979) which was picked up for the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1982. His stories give an insight into the social and economic conditions prevailing in the villages of Punjab. There is one prose work to his credit, entitled Sade har shingar (1958), and a translation into Punjabi of Maxim Gorky's work, titled as Jivan te sahit (1961).

S.S.S.

SANDHYA (Bengali) was a well known Bengali daily which ran in the early years of the present century from December 1904 to October 1907. It made a great impact on the mind of the Bengali readers by its fearless tone and uncompromising challenge to the British rule in this country. It laid stress on the ideal of the Swadeshi and tried to instil a sense of pride in the countrymen for the Indian tradition and heritage. Founded and edited by Brahmabandhav Upadhyay (1861-1907), a colourful personality who, though a staunch Brahmin, had at one stage of his life embraced Roman Catholic faith. Later, he reverted to the Hindu fold, remaining all his life a saffron-robed sannyasin of the Vedantic order. The man who had so long been impelled to experiment with different modes of faith now felt called upon to serve his motherland by joining the freedom struggle. As a means of serving the country he took to journalism and founded the paper, Sandhya. He was also connected with Bandemataram and Swaraj in an intimate way.

From the very start of its career (20 December 1904), Sandhya began to function as the mouthpiece of the common people and gave vent to their urge for national liberation. Initially, the paper had struck a comparatively milder note and concentrated on such topics as the cult of the Swadeshi, the ideal of National Education, call for a return to the Indian values, etc., but with the declaration of plan for the Partition of Bengal by Lord Curzon in July 1905 and its being put into practice by the October of the same year, Sandhya changed its tone overnight and began to spit fire, as it were, in a determined bid to resist the divisive imperialistic policy tooth and nail. It said, 'Lord Curzon wants to turn us into slaves, but we would under no circumstances allow ourselves to be made so.' To reach out to the masses both in the towns and in the countryside, it evolved a language which was half-urban, half-patois, more or less in the fashion of Swami Vivekananda's use of the Bengali colloquial tongue instinct with high seriousness of purpose. In no time did this language go straight into the heart of the people. The paper became immensely popular, and that was reason enough to draw upon it the wrath of the foreign rulers.

In 1907, quite a number of sedition suits were instituted against journals known for their strong national views. The first to be brought to book was Jugantar, whose editor Bhupendranath Datta was jailed. Aurobindo

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Ghosh was charge-sheeted for an article published in Bande mataram, an associate English journal. The next to be axed was Sandhya, whose editor Brahmabandhav was arrested for three fire-brand articles published in its pages and believed to be written by the editor himself and awaited trial. The defence was taken up by Chittaranjan Das (later endearingly called Deshbandhu) on behalf of Brahmabandhav who in a historic statement made in the court owned responsibility for the articles and boldly asserted that in carrying out his share of the God-appointed mission of Swaraj he was in no way accountable to the alien rulers. Such was the power and mission of Sandhya which stirred some of the best minds of the country in the first decade of this century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Manoranjan Guha, Brahmabandhav Upadhyay (Burdwan, 1976).

N.C.

SANDHYAKARANANDIN RAMACHARITRA (Sanskrit; 11th c.). History records three poems, each entitled Ramacharitra, written by three different poets. The first of these poems is composed by Gauda Abhinanda of the 9th century AD, the second by Kashinatha of uncertain date, and the third by Sandhyakaranandin of the eleventh century AD. Sandhyakaranandin's Ramacharitra is a curious but important work which belongs to the class of historical kavyas. It describes in two hundred and twenty Arya verses, grouped into four chapters in the manner of the Raghava-Pandaviya of Kaviraja, the story of the Ramayana on the one hand, and the history of Ramapala of the Pala dynasty, on the other. Each verse of the text has, therefore, a two-fold application; but while the epic application is not difficult to decipher, the local and contemporary references to the achievement of Ramapala require elaboration and explanation. One is often required to take the help of the Sanskrit commentary which accompanies the text and explains the historical details, but, unfortunately, it ends abruptly with verse number thirty-five of Chapter II. At the end of the work the poet informs us that he was the son of Prajapatinandin and grandson of Pinakanandin, and belonged to Pundravardhana in Varendra. Prajapatinandin was the Minister-in-charge of War and Peace in the royal court of Ramapala. From the last verse of the text it appears that Ramacharita was completed in the reign of Madanapala, son of Ramapala and third in succession from him.

The main theme of the poem is an account of a successful revolution in North Bengal carried out by the Kaivartta chief Bhima - the murder of Mahipala II, occupation of Varendrabhumi by the rebels, and the restoration of Ramapala (Mahipala's next brother) to his paternal empire. Curiously, the story continues after the demise of Ramapala, and towards the end refers to certain incidents that took place during the tenure of Madanapala. As a chronicle of contemporary events, of which the author must have had a direct knowledge, the poem is of considerable importance; it is indeed a primary source of material for re-constructing the lost history of this period.

In the work, the poet introduces himself as Kalikala-Valmiki and tells us that he is not only a literary craftsman, well-versed in the art of rhetoric, but also a great linguist. As the intention of the poet is to present the story of Rama and the history of Ramapala simultaneously, he employs the obscure figure of paronomasia (shlesha) in abundance. The poet claims that his use of paronomasia is not wearisome. An analysis of the verses, however, reveals that only those who are initiated into the mystery of linguistics and derivation of Sanskrit words and can grasp references to contemporary history are in a position to decipher the import of his verses which have double application. As an example of Sandhyakaranandin's poetry, abounding in obscure figures of alliteration and paronomasia, the following verse may be cited:

Daradalitakanakaketakakantimapyasheshakusumahitam/

Arabindendibaramayasalilasurabhisitalashvasanam//

In this verse the poet wants to describe Sita, whose beauty resembles the charm of golden ketaka flower; she is adored throughout the world and her breath is as cool and fragrant as the lotus and the lake bedecked with lilies. The verse also attempts to give a graphic description of Varendrabhumi; the charm of the land is conducive to the blossoming of water-lilies, and the lakes here are cool and fragrant because of the blooming lotuses, both red and blue. The difficulty with which the reader is confronted in arriving at the meaning of the verse is obvious. This kind of poetry, known as 'Chitra kavya' (Pictorical poetry) was practised, as a matter of fact, as a literary art in the post-Kalidasa period when the poets took pride in their skill in employment of obscure figures. Judging from this angle, Sandhyakaranandin's Ramacharita gives evidence of 'degeneration in taste', but it is to be admitted that this poem, the Bengal origin of which is known with certainty, is of profound importance for its being a chronicle of contemporary events.

R.M.

SANDHYARAGA (Kannada) is an immensely popular novel (1938) by A.N. Krishna Rao. It is the story of a musician, Lakshmana. Son of perfect parents, he is an unworldy, magnanimous younger brother of a selfish and prosperous elder brother. Losing his wife, he wanders from place to place. He wins acclaim as a musician, and his sister takes loving care of him. The elder brother is disgraced. Lakshmana is invited to give a musical concert, and dies even as his singing soars to heavenly heights.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The novel had all the ingredients of a popular novel, and drew a romantic picture of the artist as an unworldly idealist, a being of another planet altogether, which appealed to the reading public of the day. Krishna Rao, a gifted story-teller, describes the incidents with enviable felicity. The characters are clearly drawn, though the good characters are larger than life. The conflict between good and evil is clear and appealing. Along with Masti Venkatesha Iyengar's Subbanna, this novel set the trend of artist-as-hero novels.

L.S.S.R.

SANDU MALO (Rajasthani; 16th c.), medieval bard, was patronised by Rai Singh of Bikaner. Akbar, the Mughal Emperor after his annexation of Gujarat, gave Jodhpur to Raja Rai Singh. The poet extols the bravery of Raja Rai Singh, and his ballads and Dingal gits describe the events of the age. His well known poems are: Jhulna Maharaj Rai Singhji ra, Jhulna Divan Maharana Sri Pratap Singhji ra, and Jhulna Akbar Patasahaji ra.

All these poems are in the stanzaic form of jhulna and deal with Akbar, Maharana Pratap and Rai Singh. The description of the famous battle of Haldighati is an admixture of fact and fiction and is written in a language that enthuses the warriors to a life of heroism and chivalry. Besides these jhulnas, the poet has written a number of gits that have a deep emotional appeal.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hiralal Maheshwari, Rajasthani bhasha aur sahitya (Calcutta, 1960); P.L. Menaria, Rajasthani sahitya ka itihasa (Jaipur, 1968).

P.L.M

SANDHU PADMA (Rajasthani; 16th c) was a poetess and wrote powerful Dingal geets. She was betrothed to Barath Shankar, a favourite of Raja Raisingh of Bikaner (contemporary of Emperor Akbar) who honoured him with an award of one crore and a quarter rupees. Shankar broke off his relations with Padma as she had warped legs. She was, however, offered residence in the harem by Amarsingh, younger brother of Raja Raisingh. Padma was grateful and wrote songs eulogising his bravery and generosity. It is said that when Akbar sent his army to seize Bikaner it was she who inspired Amarsingh, the 'flying tiger', to fight the invading army.

Her songs are both heroic and devotional and are written in a language, simple and unadorned.

Raw. S.

SANE, PANDURANG SADASHIV (Marathi; b.1899, d.1950), also known as 'Sane Guruji' was a novelist, writer of children's books, and freedom fighter.

His book Stree jivan deals with the problems faced by women today and discusses issues like discrimination practised against them in availability of opportunities, social inequality, and inferior status given to them. His commitment to the cause of women becomes explicit in his ovis and folk songs. He has, in fact, made a significant contribution by writing thought-provoking articles and short stories also. He drew heavily on the traditional folk literature to drive home his point.

Sane Guruji wrote with seriousness of purpose and in a spirit of dedication. He discovered deep significance in things apparently inconsequential. He waged a long and valiant war against the blind imitation of western thought which he felt was corrupting our culture. His better known books such as Shyamchi aai (1935), Punarjanma (1939), Sati (1940), and Kranti (1940) are marked by integrity and honesty of purpose. His Astik (1940), dealing with racial interaction between the Aryans and the Nagas, is an allegory of Hindu-Muslim unity and aims at achieving communal and social harmony.

Sane Guruji was the founder editor of the weekly Sadhana which he brought out with missionary zeal. As writer for children, he wrote inspiring literature; every word he wrote was, in fact, charged with idealism and sincerity. His autobiographical novel Shyamchi aai (1935) got unprecedented popularity, running into twenty-five editions. P.K. Atre made it into a film with the same title which won the first ever President's gold medal for the best film production in the country. Shyam, Shyamchi aai and Shyamchi patre formed a trilogy on a boy of exemplary qualities of mind. For nearly two generations Shyam became a household name. His other two boks for children are Goda goda goshti and Dhadpadnari muley. The world that he created for children was filled with idealism where everything was good and virtuous.

In a way Sane Guruji's contribution is dated, having lost its appeal for children in the post-Independence generation, which resists his overdose of sentimentality and direct didacticism. And yet, he endeared himself to his readers with his nobility of purpose and spirit of righteousness. He wrote a large number of novels and also translated some English books into Marathi.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

A.De.

'SANEHI', GAYA PRASAD SHUKLA (Hindi; b. 1883, d. 1972) was born at Haraha in the district of Unnao (Uttar Pradesh). He did not have much formal education, but studied on his own and acquired proficiency in Hindi, Urdu and Sanskrit. He started his career as a Middle School teacher in 1899 and later, along with teaching, started writing poems in various journals. He wrote under two pen names, 'Trishul' and 'Sanehi'. He expressed nationalistic sentiments in his poems on the one hand and depicted the miserable condition of the downtrodden on the other. Therefore, the note of social inequity, disparity and economic discrimination is prominent in his poetry.

'Sanehi' had composed some twenty thousand 'chhandas', but unfortunately only a few collections of his poems are extant. Prem pachisi, Krishak-krandan, Rashtriya-manch, Rashtriya vina, Trishul-tarang, Kala mein Trishul, Sanjivani and Karuna-kadambini are his major works. He has written in both Brajbhasha and Khariboli. His contribution to the development of poetry in Khariboli is, indeed, significant. He wrote in such magazines as Rasikmitra, Pratap, Saraswati, Kavindra and Sukavi. He himself edited Sukavi, and through its medium brought many young talents to the fore. Those who came into close contact with him had deep respect for him. The credit of bringing Hindi poetry to the masses through 'Kavi Sammelans' (Poetic gatherings) goes to Sanehi. His poetry became popular, because he highlighted the problems of the people and wrote poems charged with emotional fervour. His choice of words and images, capacity for striking expression and depth of feeling, made him a much sought-after poet. He belonged to the old school or Rasavadi poetry and occupies a significant place among the poets of the Dwivedi age.

D.S.M.

SANGAM (Tamil) connotes a distinct class of literary works in Tamil composed probably in the three centuries preceding Christ, which observe meticulously certain principles of aesthetics and are governed by a common literary tradition. There is a belief that there were two earlier periods during which great literary works were composed, called the first and the second Sangam, but as none of them has survived, it is difficult to accept this belief.

Three sets of works belonging to the Sangam have come down to us: one is a collection of eight anthologies; another is a set of ten long poems, the longest not exceeding 850 lines; and third is a literary set of eighteen works. It is widely accepted that the eight anthologies rank the highest in quality, while quite a few of the eighteen works are admitted to be of a mediocre literary level and are seldom read today. It must, however, be noted that the Tirukkural, which has been translated into most of the languages of the world and is rightly held up as the common scripture for all mankind, belongs to the third collection.

Love is the main theme on which the Sangam poets loved to write. But they also sang about heroism in the battle field, about a hero's code which held honour and nobility and adherence to the pledged word as higher than life itself. They also composed poems on the king's duties and obligations, boldly standing for the people's rights when the king's actions came into conflict with them. Indeed, they courageously offered unpleasant but wholesome counsel to tyrannical, extortive kings when they attempted to execute the righteous or levy unjust taxes. Many of the eighteen works of the third collection deal with moral aphorisms.

Sangam works are marked by economy of words, great lucidity, and a directness of expression seldom to be seen in the latter works. Words are often used in their simplest literal significance and we rarely see involved figures of speech or poetic conceits. Love poems are always narrated as the version of one of the involved characters, the hero, the heroine or her girl-friend usually, and never in the poet's own version: this ensures great authenticity and power of impact. There is a positive rule that names and other identifying particulars of the characters in a love poem should not be revealed. This rule is not meticulously observed in all Sangam love poems. Love is studied in the background of five different landscapes which are organically related to different moods and stages of love: this makes Sangam love literature unique in the world of letters. English translations in prose and verse are available for much of what constitutes the first and the second collections, while one has a choice of many translations in English of the celebrated Tirukkural.

A.V.S.

SANGATI (Marathi), meaning 'companionship', is a collection of respresentative poems by A.R. Deshpande alias Anil, modern Marathi poet.

The book published in 1961, could be called a sort of poetic 'Aniliana' as it contains poems belonging to various stages through which Anil's poetry passed and covers a variety of his moods, modes, themes and innovations. In his long and dynamic career of half a century, Anil saw all the major changes—internal as well as external—in Marathi poetry, but chartered his course independent of them.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Anil was a pioneer of 'Muktachhanda' (free verse) in Marathi poetry and later an innovator of 'dashpadi', a new ten-line sonnet. A collection of his poems under the title, Dashpadi, won him the Sahitya Akademi Award (1977). His poetry reveals a rare sensitivity where the personal mingles with the social and the universal, and transforms itself into a creativity which touches the realms of the conscious and the unconscious.

Poems like 'Rusava' (Feigned anger), 'Abhisar' (Rendezvous), 'Gaanth' (Unexpected meeting), and 'Odha' (Attraction), though deeper and more matured in sensibility, remind us of his earlier self-centred love lyrics. But soon he emerges as a humanist poet who cares for the lowly and the downtrodden, as exemplified in 'Peek' (The crop) and 'Nirvasit Chini mulas' (To a Chinese refugee child, 1941). In the former, he prays for the farmers who, unmindful of heat or cold, toil day and night in their fields. In the latter, touched by the plight of a Chinese refugee child, he dwells on the cruelties perpetrated by war-mongers on innocent humanity. Poems like 'Swatantryachakra pravartan' (Revolution of the freedom-wheel), 'Arghya' (Oblution) or 'Pranam' (Salutation) are simple straight-forward patriotic poems. 'Amhi' (We), '1947' and 'Sarecha deep kase mandavale ata' (How all the lights have dimmed) reveal his deep social consciousness. According to him, our blood-besotted Independence achieved in 1947 is as sad a failure as the Mutiny of 1857. In 'Amhi' he tells us how we, the pompous and the vain-glorious, are given to self-deceipt, claiming credit for the revolution in the country which, in fact, was brought about by the sacrifice of little-known people. A bitter and self-condemning satire, this poem exposes our national character. The poet is filled with anger and pain to see the national fabric infested with worms like hoarders, power-mongers, crafty politicians and self-seekers. And yet we all forbear everything and do nothing. 'Sarecha deep kase' is sadder in tone and expresses the poet's dismay, since we are surrounded everywhere by mediocrities and pigmies and there is no one tall enough to evoke our respect and admiration.

Though basically not a nature poet, Anil has written some beautiful nature poems also. 'Shravan zad' (continuous rain in Shravan), 'Sharadagam' (Coming of Sharad), 'Pavsali sanj' (An evening in rainy season), 'Van-rani' (The forest queen), 'Ashwin', 'Meghanchi bhoomi' (Land of the clouds) are his well-known nature poems.

Anil's dashpadis, of which ten are included here, show him at his best. Most of them are intimately personal and reflective in mood. 'Virani', 'Ekaki' (lonely), 'Shravan zad', 'Anibani' (Emergency), and 'Pavsali sanj' reflect the meditative mood and occasionally reveal a streak of mysticism in Anil's later poetry.

I.S.

SANGATYA (Kannada) is a form of poetic composition which came into vogue in Kannada in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. It is a four-line stanza comprising two halves. The first and the third lines have four 'vishnuganas' and the third and the fourth have two vishnuganas, and one 'brahmagana'. It lends itself to singing. It is generally called 'hadugabha' ('hadu' meaning song). Its origin may be traced to folk poetry.

It is said that Sisumayana (1500) was the first poet to use this metre. He composed two works in sangatya—Anjana charitre (based on Ravisena's Sanskrit Padmacharitre, and Tripura dahana (The burning of the triple fortress), an allegorical poem. Some critics are of the view that Depraj (1410) who composed Sobagina sone was the first to employ this metre; others think that the Jaina poets like Vijayanna (1448), Terakanambi Bommarasa (1485) and Kalyan Kirti (1439) who have written sangatya poems came earlier than Sisumayana. As the dates of many of these poets are still uncertain, all that can be said is that the sangatya poets developed the metre in the fifteenth century, and that Sisumayana made it well-known.

The sixteenth century is the golden period of sangatya poetry. A host of poets of considerable merit, of all castes and creeds, used this metre during this period. Jaina poets like Magarasa III (1508), Salva (1550), Ratnakaravarni (1557), Padmarasa (1599) and Brahmakavi (1600); Veerashaiva poets like Nijaguna Shivayogi (1500), Nanjunda (1525), Linga (1550) and Gouvaravanka (1584); brahmin poets like Vadiraja (1570) and Pradhani Tirumalarya (1600); and Kanakadasa who is generally believed to have belonged to a shepherd's family—all wrote sangatya poems.

Bharathesha vaibhava of Ratnakaravarni of Mudabidri is a classic, which suitably employs sangatya. Sangatya poets have also composed valuable narratives about historical persons. Among other poets who used this metre, Nanjunda in Kumara Rama charite and Govinda Vaidya (1650) in Kantivara Narasaraja charite, deserve mention.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Even though more than sixty poets wrote sangatya poems in the seventeenth century only a few like Govinda Vaidya, Honnamma and Srirangamma wrote anything noteworthy. Not many women have written poetry in Kannada, but three of them chose sangatya, including Sanchiya Honnamma (1700), the author of Hudibadeya dharma. She depicts the ways and values of an ideal Hindu wife and mother, and at the same time calls upon men not to look down upon women with contempt but to recognize that every one is the son of a mother who brought him up. Sringaramma wrote Padmini purana. Helavanakatti Giriyamma, who may be compared to Mira Bai, pours out her devotion to Lord Krishna in Chandrahasa kathe.

During the modern period, D.R. Bendre used sangatya with a slight modification for one of his great poems, 'Sakhigeeta' (1937). S.V. Parameshwara Bhatta also chose it for his 'Indrachapa' (1965). D. Padmanabha Sharma's 'Jwalamalini Mahatmemathu samantabhadrara sangati' (1958) runs into 15 cantos.

Sangatya is an entirely native metre. Judging by the works so far composed, it seems suited for elaborate description, leisurely narration, and reflection. Popular sangatya poems are sung even to this day.

V.H.

SANGEET STHANIK SWARAJYA ALIAS MUNICIPALITY (Marathi) by Madhavrao Joshi, first published and performed in 1925, is a comedy in three acts, exposing the evils in the functioning of Local Self-Government bodies. Dramatists like Khadilkar, Kolhatkar and Gadkari dominated the Marathi theatre during the years 1920-1925, and this play echoes their spirit of comedy, though with a difference.

The plays of the elder dramatists mainly focused on the lives of the upper class people, while Madhavarao Joshi's major plays, on the contrary, have the common man and his life at the centre. His Sangeet sthanik swarajya alias Muncipality presents a realistic picture of contemporary society and unmasks social vices in a satirical vein.

The play does not have any plot as such in the conventional sense. At the end of the nineteenth century, some cities in Maharashtra were given the right of local self-government, and municipalities were formed to give the people restricted freedom. The members elected on the Municipal Council were, however, in many cases, men of dubious integrity. The play parodies the corrupt practices of the councillors. Greed for money, power and status make people fight the elections. A member, once elected, does not bother about the development of the city or the welfare of the citizens. He cares only for his own interest. The play shows how nepotism has eaten up the system. Professor Thombe, Dr Bachnag, Kondiba Nhavi, Gattulal Marwadi, Varahashastri, President Ajagal, Chief Officer Gaitonde are the members and office bearers of the Municipality. They embezzle the funds with mutua consent. There is Dhenuvallabh who makes fast buck during the War and wants to become an aristocrat overnight. He is angling for a prestigious title from the Government, and aspires to be President of the Municipality. He has intimate relations with Kapila, a muncipal school teacher of easy virtue, who chooses to flirt with him for the sake of money. One of the attractions of the play is the caricature of Dhenuvallabh. Sweepers Gangu and Ambu, supervisor Rangrao, Sheikh Hussain, and the peon are the counterpart of corrupt people in the higher echelons of society.

Pandoba, however, is a man with a difference. He keeps himself above the caucus. To see things for himself, he gets into the system as private secretary to Dhenuvallabh on Kapila's recommendation. He watches Dhenuvallabh and the councillors at work and finds them involved in profiteering, gambling and squander-mania—in Vanity fair, indeed.

Elections to the Muncipality are held in the third act of the play. Everyone is trying his best to get himself elected. Then comes a police officer who uncovers the malpractices in the elections and arrests Dhenuvallabh and other candidates together with their aides.

The play is full of sarcasm and makes good use of irony and parody. Its language is richly variegated, borrowing words and phrases from Marathi, Kunbi, Hindi and Marwari. It tries to bridge the gap between the audience and the stage, and became very popular in the twenties.

S.R.C.

SANGHAKKALI (Malayalam) is a ceremonial-cum artistic ritual performed by the Nambudiri brahmins of Kerala. Yatrakali and Panemkali are words used as synonyms for Sanghakkali. Sastiankam, Chattirankam, Panayum Kaliyum and Panakkali are also other popular names of the same form. People of south Kerala previously called the form Yatrakali, while the northerners called it Panemkali. Even though the word 'satram' has got various meanings, the term is used in the 14th century text Unnunilisandesha as a post-marriage ceremony. 'Satram' was usually conducted after the brahmin rituals like 'chorunu' (giving the first meal to a child), 'Pantrantam masam' (day of completing twelve months after the death of a person), etc.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

There were ten sanghas or organizations which conducted the satras—natya mangalam, Porakutinjam, Attupuram, etc. The word 'satra' in later years became corrupted as 'chattira' and then as 'yatra'. Thus 'satram' came to be called also Yatrakali, Sanghakkali and Panemkali.

Sangha originally meant a group of warriors. The Nayars and later the Nambudiris were the participants of these sanghas. In middle Kerala, especially around Trichur, the term 'sanghakkali' was popular. There are many references to this in the ancient texts and inscriptions. There are some legends in support of Sanghakkali and many conventions are combined in the organic form of Sanghakali. They include songs and prose dialogues in dialectal slang. Various talas and kalas are employed in the songs, and the dialogues powerfully reflect and criticise social life. Directions for participants are also given. Sanghakkali is almost an extinct form of ritual and audio-visual art form now. There were twenty-two 'Chattirayogas', groups which used to perform Sanghakkali. It was almost a domestic social affair and reflected the contemporary social, religious and political life. People believed that Sangakkali pleased the gods and brought good to those who conducted it.

V.S.S.

'SANGI', ABDUL HUSAIN KHAN (Sindhi; b. 1851, d. 1924), a well-known Sindhi poet, was son of Mir Abhas Ali Khan Talpur and grandson of Mir Muhmmad Nasir Khan, the last Muslim ruler of Sindh, who was defeated by the British in 1843, and sent to Calcutta along with his relatives as a political prisoner. Mir Muhammad Nasir Khan died in Calcutta in 1845. Mir Abbas Ali Khan tried to adjust himself to the new situation and married a European lady in Calcutta in 1849, who had fallen in love with him on seeing his valour in killing a lion with a sword in the Sunderban forest. Abdul Husain was the child of that European lady; but he could not get the love of his mother, for she expired on the sixth day of delivery. Unfortunately, in April 1857 his father, Abbas Ali Khan, also died in an accident. About two years after this incident, the Mirs were permitted to return to Sindh. Thus, a young boy Abdul Husain returned in 1859 to Hyderabad, Sindh, along with his paternal uncle and other relatives. He was reared and educated by his grandmother, and then by his paternal uncle, Mir Muhammad Hasan Ali Khan 'Hasan' (1824-1909), who himself was an eminent poet. Abdul Husain Khan in a short time acquired good knowledge of Arabic, Persian, Urdu, English and Sindhi. At the age of nineteen, he got infatuated with Hajiran, the beautiful daughter of a boatman living on the banks of the river Sindhu, and married her after a few months. After living a happy life of four years with her husband, she died in 1874. It was a severe shock for Sangi, and he began to wander aimlessly in grief for about two years when he was persuaded by his uncle and other relatives to marry the daughter of a European civil surgeon of Hyderabad. The second marriage brought back peace and happiness in the life of Sangi. In 1878, Sangi was appointed a first class magistrate in Hyderabad. These powers he enjoyed for the remaining part of his life. It is said that the amount of political pension that Sangi got from the British Government was not sufficient for his family. In spite of that he led his entire life with honesty, dignity and self-respect befitting his royal family. The poet has called himself Sangi which means a wanderer, a nomad.

Sangi's poetry has been critically edited and compiled under the title Kulyat-e-Sangi on the basis of manuscripts and published works by N.A. Baloch, and published by the Sindhi Adabi Board, Hyderabad, Sindh, in 1969. The book contains three volumes of Diwan Sangi, out of which the first two were originally published in 1903 and 1904 respectively by Harisingh from Sukkur (Sindh). The third one remained in manuscript form until it was obtained by N.A. Baloch and included in the present book. Kulyat-e-Sangi also contains miscellaneous Sindhi 'Kafis', devotional poetry, ghazals, qasidas and other poetic compositions of the poet written in Siraiki, Urdu and Persian languages. The importance of the present edition has been greatly enhanced by the critical introduction of 85 pages written by the editor. It contains the life of the poet, an evaluation of his poetry, rare photographs of the poet and his companions, and some specimens of the pages from the manuscript written by the poet himself. Sangi was not only a poet of eminence, but also a prose writer and critic. He has written folk-tales and stories in prose and has prepared a biography of Shah Abdul Latif in Persian, entitled Lutaif Latifi, the first work of its kind. Sangi had completed its manuscript in 1888. It was published by the British Cultural Centre Committee, Hyderabad, Sindh.

As a poet, Sangi belongs to the Persian school of Sindhi poetry. He has been adjudged by literary critics the best ghazal writer in Sindhi. In spite of following the convention and tradition of Persian poetry, Sangi has profusely depicted his personal experience in his ghazals, thus giving them an appeal almost unique in Sindhi. Like Shah Abdul Latif, he has drawn his similes, metaphors and images from the various trades and professions of Sindh. As a poet, he has portrayed the nature of his region in his poems, and refers frequently to the socio-cultural, political and literary situations in Sindh during his time.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

He has boldly criticised at several places those people who blindly follow the west, and stoop low before the British officials. An element of satire and humour based on contemporary situations gives his poetry a new turn. Thus, Sangi is the most readable, modern and mellifluous of the Persian school of Sindhi poets.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: N.A. Baloch, Kulyat-e-Sangi (1969), Muhammad Sidiq Memon, Sindhi Adab, Vol II (Hyderabad, Sindh, 1951).

M.K.J.

SANJANA, JEHANGIR EDALJI (Gujarati; b. 1880, d. 1964) was a critic and scholar of standing in Gujarati literature. As critic, he was objective, bold, hard-hitting, and above personal predilections and bias. His criticism reflects his erudition and total commitment to literature. He was dissatisfied with Gujarati prose and considered it poor in quality, but he would not tolerate any disrespect towards Gujarati and Sanskrit. In versification, he stood for regular metre and believed that sound and sense should go together in poetry. He considered Kalidasa the acme of perfection in the art of poetry. Sanjana was well versed in several languages. Marathi was almost like a mother-tongue to him, and he was equally conversant with Persian, Urdu, English, and Sanskrit. His Gujarati was chaste and his knowledge of English deep.

Sanjana delivered five lectures on Gujarati literature under the Thakkar Vasamji Foundation Scheme, sponsored by the University of Bombay (1942). They were published in book form as Studies in Gujarati Literature (1950) which dealt with the background of Gujarati literature, poets Narmad and Dalpatram, and modern Gujarati poetry and prose. His another important book is Anaryanan adapalam (Pranks of a non-Aryan, 1955). His sense of satire is revealed in the title of the book itself. It is a collection of articles on various topics, such as Sanskrit and Gujarati, Parsis and the Gujarati language, poet Khabardar's Maha chand, Gujarati blank verse, aim of literature, etc. He wrote a detailed review of the book called Klānt kavi or kalānt kavi (1944), a collection of poet Balashankar Kantharia's poems edited by Umashankar Joshi, in which he made a scathing attack on the editor. He wrote a book, Caste and Outcaste, challenging the orthodoxy of Hindu religion. The book shows him as a master of irony and sarcasm.

M.H.J.

SANJAYAN (Malayalam; b.1903, d.1944). Manikkothu Ramunni Nair, or M.R. Nair, who became famous as Sanjayan, the pen-name he assumed while starting literary contributions to his own periodical of that name, was born at Tellicherry in north Malabar. Towards the close of his studies he was a student of Christian College, Madras, and took his postgraduate degree in English from the University there. Later, he acquired proficiency in Sanskrit and astrology. He is said to have had a smattering of French and German as well. His domestic life was darkened by the death of his wife, only son and elder brother, but the tragedies did not depress his spirits or blight his creative talent—so great was his faith in God. Though initially a poet with some short excellent poems to his credit, Sanjayan is chiefly known as a writer of essays most of which first appeared in some of the well-known contemporary periodicals. The poems and essays reveal him as a good thinker, a keen observer, a fearless and impartial critic, master of exquisite style and above all, a humorist of a very high order. He always held aloft the cardinal virtues such as justice and prudence and excercised his superb literary and intellectual powers so as to usher in an era free from corruption, selfishness and other anti-social evils. Some of his grippingly humorous essays are Bharthrujatha, Changalamparanta Parliament, Avarute ana and Guardian vilapam. His essays have been collected and brought out in six volumes by the Mathrubhumi Publishers.

Antyopaharam and Hasyanjali are two posthumously published collections of his poems. His Malayalam translation of Shakespeare's Othello is another contribution.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: T.M. Chummar, Bhasha gadya sahitya charitram; T.S.Bhattathiripad, Sanjaya sahityam; Ulloor S.Parameswara Iyer, Kerala sahitya charitram, Vol.V.

K.S.N.

SANJEMBAM NODIA SINGH (Manipuri; b. 1917), a pioneer poet of modern Manipuri literature, was born in a Hindu family. He studied at Johnstone High School and later at Churachand High School, and started his career at the Government Press, Manipur, where he worked in different capacities. He now leads a retired life. Chaoba Nongthongi Ashamba Punshi (Short Life of Chaoba Nongthon), a ballad based on the legendary life, achievements and exploits of a courtier of Moirang of Khamba Thoibi fame was published in 1972. The poem is a ballad written in the language and style of the folk-singers of Manipur who are known as Pena Shakpa and Khonjem Parba Shakpa. The poet's achievement is noteworthy. Besides, several lyrical poems by him have been published in different literary journals which are marked by ornate language, imagery and regular rythmic cadence. He was associated with the establishment of many literary and cultural organisations in Manipur, such as Uddipani (now defunct) and the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad of which he has been an Executive Committee member for several years. He has the voice of a folk-singer which can charm his audience.

Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

I.R.B.S.

SANJI DHARTI BAKHLE MANU (Dogri), the second longest novel in Dogri by Kanta Jamwal, was published in 1976. For its unique content and treatment of subject, it received awards from J&K Cultural Academy (1977) and Sahitya Akademi (1978). The novel was transcreated in Hindi by Ashok Jerath, under the title Dharti apni apni.

Prior to the publication of Sanji dharti bakhle manu, the novels published in Dogri mostly dealt with the rural life and atmosphere, depicting local social and economic problems. It is the first time that the images of military life with which the Dogras have been so much concerned, have been reflected in this novel. The plot of the novel has been woven with the strands of socio-romantic elements blended with the events that disturbed the human life in Duggar land during the time from 1935 to 1965. Military disturbances, partition of the country in the wake of Independence, effect of secular forces on the divided units which gave birth to the conflicting situations in deteriorating politics, form the theme of the novel. Two schoolmates, Akram and Ranjit of Poonch School, who are also good friends, suddenly find themselves in the Defence Services School at Dehra Dun. After completing their training, both are posted in the Sialkot sector. They meet after a long interval of tiresome fighting, but destiny played a crucial role in snapping the emotional string that bound both the friends. The second phase of the novel starts with the partition of the country and the death of Ranjit's father in communal riots, creating a gulf between Ranjit and Akram. After Independence, Ranjit makes progress in his career and rises to the position of Brigadier, and his son, Gajraj Singh, gets a commission in the army, while Akram chooses to migrate to Pakistan.

In the third phase of the novel, Ranjit and Akram meet in an emotion-packed situation after the 1965 conflict between India and Pakistan. The big gap of eighteen years and subsequent events had created a wide chasm between the two friends. Ranjit fails to bring himself to a state of mind which could bind him with the emotional past of the old friendship, but finally, the common loss of friendship for both the soldiers brings a gleam of recognition into their eyes.

The novel describes in some detail the problems of soldiers and their families, and the behaviour patterns of our boys in uniform at different levels, especially in acute abnormal situations. Realistic situations are, however, marred by idealistic and emotional patches introduced to make the events colourful for the Dogra readers.

As.J.

SANKARA KURUP, G. (Malayalam; b.1901, d.1972). Destined to become the first ever recipient of the prestigious Bharatiya Jnanpith Award and the most distinguished poet in Malayalam after the trio of Asan, Vallattol and Ulloor, Sankara Kurup, often represented by the letter 'G', was born in a rather poor family in Nayathode, a village near Kalady (the birth-place of Adi Sankara). He learnt a little Sanskrit and English, but his only academic qualification was the Vidvan title from the University of Madras, for which he secured the first rank with distinction. He became a tutor in the Maharaja's College, Ernakulam, after being a teacher for about fifteen years in different educational institutions under the government of Cochin. Later, he was promoted to the rank of Professor of Malayalam. After retiring in 1956, he had a stint as Producer at the Trivandrum station of All India Radio.

Sankara Kurup started writing at the age of nine and published some Sanskrit shlokas while studying in the ninth standard. He came under the spell of the great trio of Malayalam poetry, especially Vallattol. Most of the poems included in his first collection, Sahitya kautukam (1923) show the poet's imitative tendency. Nature, love and patriotism are the main themes. In some of them he appears even as a worshipper of nature longing for communication with her. The same collection shows that he is as much a lover of beauty, not merely the external beauty of the world, but beauty emanating from the mind or soul. Kurup's nationalistic sentiment, as reflected in the poems, is not regional, but something that widens out to encompass the whole of India.

Sankara Kurup also gives vent to the feelings and aspirations of the poor and the downtrodden and champions their emancipation. Inherited position, ill-gotten wealth and the power and pomp associated with them, he always detested. He, in fact, calls for a radical change in the outlook of the people and visualizes a world order based on equality and fraternity. 'Nale' (Tomorrow), 'Aramattil'(In the flower-garden) and 'Thoopukari' (The sweeper-woman) are only a few of the poems written by him to express or suggest his views in this regard.

Though progressive to the point of being revolutionary in his outlook and approach, Sankara Kurup has deep cultural and spiritual moorings. In many of his poems, the teachings of the Upanishads run like a thread, climaxed by the cosmic vision of the universe in 'Vishvadarshanam', in which he sees himself an infinitesimal speck.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

'Perumtachan' which has been translated into English under the title 'The Master Carpenter' tells the story of a master carpenter who kills, as if accidentally, his own son for fear that the latter may surpass him in their traditional occupation. 'Chandanakkattil' is another significant poem.

Sankara Kurup was probably the first to develop and establish mysticism and symbolism in Malayalam poetry. 'Ente veli' (Marriage) is one of his famous mystical poems. In this, a bride is described as waiting for her groom. Apart from this obvious meaning, it has also an undertone in that the bride stands for the human soul and the groom for death. 'Nishagitam' (Night-song), 'Adrishyapushpam' (The invisible flower) and 'Bhringa-giti' (Beetle-song) are some other poems of the same kind.

'Nimisham' (The moment) is a typical example of Sankara Kurup's symbolic poetry. In this, each moment is symbolised as a butterfly which, with its multi-coloured wings, is portrayed as drinking honey from the flower of life and passing off, leaving man behind. Other examples are 'Koonukal' (Mushrooms), 'Nale' (Tomorrow), etc. Because of the streak of mystic symbolism, Sankara Kurup has been charged with obscurity.

Sankara Kurup is a prolific poet and writer. Besides four volumes of Sahitya kautukam there are over a dozen collections to his credit, the more notable ones being Suryakanti (1933), Pujapushpam (1943), Idalukal (1948), Odakkuzhal (1950), Vishvadarshanam (1960) and Jivana-sangitam (1964). There are also three collections of juvenile poems. His verse translations of Omar Khayyam's Rubaiyat (1932), Kalidasa's Meghaduta (1944), Bhasa's Madhyama vyayoga (1946) and Rabindra-nath Tagore's Gitanjali (1959) are also well-known. His other works, all in prose, include five plays, four volumes of essays and the autobiography Ormakalude olangalil. These, especially the essays, reveal his critical insight and evaluative skill, besides the mastery of a style with poetic touches.

He was a recipient of numerous prizes and honours such as the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award (1961), Sahitya Akademi Award (1963), Soviet Land-Nehru Award (1967), Padmabhushan (1968) and the fellowship of the Sahitya Akademi (1970). He was also President of the Kerala Sahitya Akademi, President of Sahitya Parishad and Editor of its organ, Traimasikam and a nominated member (1968-1972) of the Rajyasabha. Perhaps, the greatest honour is Jnanpith Award which he received in 1965 for his Odakkuzhal. It is significant that the award money of one lakh rupees was utilised to form the Guruvayoorappan Trust, which has since been giving away each year a sum of rupees one thousand as Odakkuzhal Award for the best Malayalam literary work produced in that year.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Chengarappalli Narayanan Potti, Malayala sahitya sarvaswam; D.Benjamin, Jiyude bhavagitangal; M. Leela-vathy, Jiyude kavya jivitham and Amritam asnuthe; Sukumar Azhikode, G. Vimarshikkappedunnu (1963); T.M. Chummar, Padya sahitya charitram; Vakkam Abdul Khader, Jiyum bhashakavikalum (1947).

T.G.R.P.
K.S.N.

SANKARA PILLAI, G. (Malayalam; b. 1930, d. 1990) was an eminent Malayalam dramatist. After taking his M.A. degree in Malayalam, he did research on folk songs for three years. He then worked as lecturer at Gandhi-gram Rural Institute for four years. After working in the office of Malayalam Lexicon for three years, he became Professor of Malayalam at Devasvam Board College, Sastamkotta. In 1975 he was appointed Chairman of the Kerala Sangita Nataka Akademi. He was Director of the School of Drama established by Calicut University at Trichur, and also Director, School of Letters, at Gandhi University, Kottayam.

He shot into limelight when he won the first prize in the drama competition conducted by Sahitya Parishat in 1957 for his play Vivaham svargattil natakkunnu (Mar-riage takes place in Heaven). It is the story of a young man whose true love faces the hurdle of parental objection. Finally, the father relents and permits his son to marry the girl of his choice, and blesses the couple. The story is spread over six well-constructed scenes. The dialogue is precise and to the point. Verbosity has been avoided, and characterization is superb.

His Dharmakshetre Kurukshetre is a play in five acts. He says in his preface that it may be considered to be a series of five one-act-plays based on the Mahabharata. In the first act Bhishma makes his final attempt to make peace, but fails. The second act depicts Kunti's last meeting with Karna. In the third act Kunti asks Dharma-putra to pay homage to the dead Karna. The fourth act depicts Duhshala requesting Arjuna to spare her grand-son, who is only a few days old. In the fifth act Kunti decides to go to the forest along with Dhritarashtra and Gandhari.

He was influenced by Ibsen and Bernard Shaw in his early plays and by Beckett in his later plays. His early plays are lucid and powerful, while his later plays are obscure. He established an amateur dramatic troupe entitled, Prasadhana. He was not only a playwright, but an actor and director as well.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

He wrote more than twenty plays. Vivaham svargattil natakkunnu, Dharmakshetre Kurukshetre, Sabarmati dureyanu, Pe pitichcha lokam, Reyil palangal, poymukhangal, Abhayartthikal, Tottampattu, Snehadutan and Sandhya are some of his important works.

M.Da.

SANKARA RAM (Tamil) is the pseudonym of T.L. Natesan, a Tamil novelist. He became a creative writer after serving the Postal Department for a brief period of time. It is said that his ardent love for Gandhian principles which beneficially inform his works led him to creative writing. His earlier works like Children of the Kaveri and Creatures (collections of short stories) and Love of Dust (1938) were written in English. He was one of the early members of the P.E.N organisation. He himself translated his novel Love of Dust into Tamil as Mannasai (1940) which is his best creative work. This moving novel portrays the tenacious attachment of a farmer to his soil. It is a regional novel, and there is a graphic and vivid portrayal of the rustic life. His other novels include Kariyatarisi (Secretary, 1949), Inpa ulakam (World of happiness, 1962), Nila pasam (Attachment), Parichalotti (Ferryman), Pana Paramasivam, Arul pannai (Farm of grace) and Tiyum vetiyum (Fire and explosion). He has also authored several short stories in Tamil. A lover of animals, he built a zoo of his own on the banks of the Cauvery, and tended various kinds of animals, birds and reptiles.

A.A.M.

SANKARACHARYA (Sanskrit; 8th-9th c. AD) is considered the greatest exponent of Vedanta or Indian philosophy, 'who at the age of thirty could be at once the Aquinas and the Kant of India' (Will Durant). The earliest commentaries on the basic triad of Indian philosophy—the Upanishads, the Bhagavadgita and the Vedanta Sutras—which have survived to this day are his. His influence extended beyond the academic confines of professional philosophers to permeate the daily lives of the common people and is acknowledged even by the non-Vedic traditions like the Yoga and the Tantra. Hinduism as it is practised today is largely the product of his synthesizing efforts. The history of Indian philosophy after him may very well be described as the record of confirmations or contradictions of his doctrine. His philosophy which had spread over India during the course of centuries crossed the seas in the last century and has gained adherents in more continents than one at present.

Sankara's life and times are clouded by the absence of reliable evidence and confused by later accounts. Legends are many, lists of pontificates diverse and biographies quite late and conflicting. One has to rely on internal clues which may help to fix an approximate date but throw little light on biographical and other details. Yet the Sankaradigvijaya of Madhava has enjoyed general acceptance all over India. According to this, Sankara was born at Kalati in Kerala. He lost his father in early childhood. Responding to an inner call, he took sanyasa in his eighth year and went north in search of a teacher. He met Govinda Bhagavatpada, a monk belonging to the school of Gaudapada, on the banks of the Narmada and studied the Vedanta under him. Then he undertook a tour of north India propounding the Advaita doctrine and controverting others. He composed the commentary on the Vedanta Sutras at Varanasi, establishing that monism or absolutism was the final import of Badarayana and of Vedanta itself. Then he wrote the commentaries on the Gita and the Upanishads and supplemented them with a few independent tracts. He is also credited to have composed many devotional hymns. He travelled the length and breadth of India thrice declaring Advaita to be the supreme philosophy, engaging himself in philosophical debates, reforming spiritual practices and re-organizing religious life. He purified the six sects of obnoxious elements which had crept into them and initiated the worship of five deities by every Hindu as a part of daily ritual. He established four holy sees at the four corners of India—Sringeri in the south, Dwaraka in the west, Puri in the east and Badari in the north for teaching the true meaning of the scriptures and maintaining the correct practice of religion, thus making them directorates of spiritual wisdom, scriptural interpretation and religious practice. Thus the geographical boundaries of India were made its religious boundaries also. He consecrated his four disciples as the first pontiffs of these centres. After accomplishing all this in a short span of thirty-two years, Sankara passed away in the Himalayas.

Calculations based on the birth charts given in the Sankaravijayas and on the lists of pontiffs in the various monasteries have assigned Sankara to periods that extend from the 6th century BC to the 8th century AD. But internal evidence and the references to Sankara by other authors have led modern scholars to place him in the 8th century. The generally accepted dates are AD 788 to AD 820.

A corpus consisting of commentaries on the Vedanta Sutras, the Gita and twelve Upanishads, about thirty independent tracts, nearly 250 hymns, a Tantric work and a commentary on Patanjali's Yoga Sutras bears the name of Sankara as the author. Tradition has admitted them to be authentic, but modern scholarship has expressed serious reservations about them. The works are classified into three categories: authentic, apocryphal and spurious. The commentaries on the ten major Upanishads, the Gita and the Vedanta Sutras, the treatise Upadeshasahasri, and the 'Bhajagovindam' hymn are generally considered authentic. Recently the commentary on the Yoga Sutras is added to this list. Vivekachudamani, Saundaryalahari, the commentary on the Shvetasvatara Upanishad and a few others are included in the second category. The rest are pronounced spurious. But the contents of the categories differ from scholar to scholar and the criteria for classification are neither uniform, nor decisive, nor convincing. Even among the works considered authentic there are dissenting voices regarding the commentaries on the Chhandogya and the Mandukya Upanishads and the Gita. Yet the volume of writing held authentic is quite prodigious for a short life of thirty-two years busily occupied with extensive travel, philosophic debate and religious reform.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Sankara was only following Indian tradition when he chose to present his philosophy through commentaries on the basic triad of the Vedanta—the Upanishads, the Gita and the Vedanta Sutras. Although quite distinct as texts, these were held to present a single unified doctrine. The intuitive insights of the Upanishads were lucidly reiterated by the Gita and logically coordinated by the Vedanta Sutras. The task of philosophy is not merely to discover the true meaning of these texts individually but to demonstrate how the intuitions of the Upanishads are confirmed by the Gita and justified by the Vedanta Sutras. This Sankara seems to have done to a greater extent than other philosophers and presented 'a religio-philosophical world-view which in depth, consistency and finish could not easily be matched in the whole world' (Paul Deussen).

Nature, man and God, says Sankara, comprise the entire scope of human knowledge. Of these, the first is an appearance, a projection or maya of God. The second is the spirit limited by ignorance or avidya. The third is Pure Spirit or Absolute Brahman, the ground of all being, whose nature is reality, consciousness and bliss. With reference to the universe and human life, it appears as God, the creator, the preserver and the destroyer. The discovery of this is the goal of philosophy and its realization the summum bonum of human life. Both these require not only intellectual acumen but also moral purity which is gained through religious practices, devotional love and spiritual meditation. Thus equipped, the seeker proceeds to study the Upanishads, think deeply on their teachings and meditate on their message. This leads him to the final release from the cycle of birth and death. This release is of two kinds—a permanent place in heaven if the seeker has meditated upon God or qualified Brahman and merger in Brahman here and now if he has meditated upon the Pure Spirit or Absolute Brahman. The intuitions of the Upanishads or the Vedanta thus find their confirmation and fulfilment in the life of the self-realized saint or mystic.

This, in brief, is Sankara's philosophy. It is propounded with a range of scholarship, depth of insight, boldness of spirit, subtlety of argument, coherence of interpretation, force of conviction and lucidity of expression unparalleled in the realm of Indian philosophical writing. His literary style is justly praised for combining profundity with lucidity. Sankaracharya is a rare combination of a philosopher and a poet, a mystic and a reformer. His unique achievement lies in reminding men of their forgotten divinity and of their primary duty to recover it, and in assuring them that they can do it here and now, in this world and in this life, and urging them to undertake the quest with courage and confidence.

N.Bal.

SANKARADAS SWAMIGAL (Tamil; b. 1867, d. 1922), a noted dramatist, had his early education under his father and Palani Dhandapani Swamigal. He worked for some time as Accountant in the Salt Factory at Tuticorin. In his twenty-fourth year, he entered the field of drama.

Vexed with life for a spell, he donned the ochre robe and pilgrimaged from place to place. This earned him the title 'Swamigal'. At the request of Mahavidwan Kanchiraman Poondiya Pillai of Pudukottai, he re-entered the stage and worked assiduously.

There were no serious plays written after Sundaram Pillai's Manonmaneeyam. Sankaradas Swamigal stepped in at an appropriate time and amply filled the gap. He conducted very ably the Samarasa Sanmarga Nataka Sabha and Tatva Meena Lochani Vidwa Bala Sabha. He was stage director in the Bala Meena Ranjani Sabha for many years. Some of the actors like T.K. Shanmugam and T.K. Baghavati trained by him became renowned artistes.

Sankaradas Swamigal wrote about forty plays. His famous play Abhimanyu Sundari was written at one stretch in one night. His style of writing was an admixture of songs and prose in the day-to-day parlance of the common man. He was well-versed in singing Vanna padal, Santha padal, etc., and introduced these metres in the numerous songs of his plays. His other plays are: Alli charithiram (1934), Valli Thirumanam (1937), Sathi Anasuya, Satyavan Savitri, Seemanthini, etc.

He was respectfully called 'Gurudev'. He introduced spectacular scenic effects by gorgeous stage settings, appropriate costumes, sweet music, and apt prose interspersed with proverbs. In his plays, sage Narada had an important place. He was the precursor of the modern stage.

Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

S.Sr.

SANKARADEVA (Assamese; b.1449, d.1568) was born at Bardowa, district Nowgaon, in the family of the Bara Bhuyan chief, Kusumavara. He lost his parents in his infancy. At the village school he showed extraordinary proficiency, and emerged at the end of five or six years of schooling an accomplished scholar of Sanskrit. He was, however, singularly indifferent to worldly affairs. The family got him married soon and imposed on him the coarser duties of a Shiromani Bhuyan. His wife, however, died immediately after giving birth to a daughter. He waited for a few years, gave the daughter in marriage to Hari Bhuyan, and in 1481 started on a long pilgrimage of twelve years, visiting holy places in northern India. After returning home he worked for the propagation of the bhakti cult in which he seems to have been greatly encouraged by his reading of the Bhagavata-purana with Shridhara Swami's commentary. He had, however, to desert his birth-place soon to avoid constant skirmishes with the Kacharis, and after temporary stays at several places he, with his kinsfolk, settled in the Majuli island on the river Brahmaputra in the Ahom territory. There was another period of unrest, but the severity of its effect upon him was, however, redeemed by the acquisition of a worthy disciple and, later, his chief apostle, Madhavadeva. When Sankaradeva's son-in-law Hari was put to the executioner's sword by royal orders, he decided to leave the Ahom kingdom and migrate to the state of Koch-Behar, Kamarupa. The saint and his followers settled finally at Patbausi. Here the order set up by him began to grow in strength and size. After a visit to Puri, covering a few months, at the age of about ninety-seven, he was confronted with fresh hostilities. The anti-Vaishnava camp abused the ears of Naranarayana with vilely distorted accounts of the saint's activities. For a time he managed to elude arrest but had at last to present himself at the Koch court. The king possessed a liberal disposition and a scholarly bent of mind, and the meeting turned to the saint's favour.

Sankaradeva's literary career may be divided into three periods, conforming to his life respectively in (1) the Kayastha territories, (2) the Ahom kingdom, and (3) the Koch state. To the first period belong his Harishchandra-upkhyana, Bhakti-pradipa, Kirtana-ghosha, Rukminiharana-kavya, the first Bargitas, Bhagavata VI Bhagavata VIII and Gunamala, ii-vi.

The second period saw his Kirtana-ghosha, Bhagavata X, XI, XII, I, II, IX (mentioned in one biography but not found), Kurukshetra, Nimi-nava-siddha-samvada, Guna-mala (ch.i), Ramayana, Uttarakanda, Bargita (Collection), Bhakti-ratnakara, and the dramas, Kalidamana, Keli-gopala, Rukmini-harana, Parijata-harana, and Rama-vijaya (1568).

Harishchandra-upakhyana (Episode of King Harishchandra) is generally considered the earliest work of the saint and assigned to his school-days, which terminated around his twentieth year. It is also the first work in 615 verses which formulated the teachings of Sankaradeva's cult in broad outline. The narration has the freshness of a young writer. The episode is taken from the Markandeya-purana and is developed with little alteration in the main course of the events, but the young poet adds poetic sentiments, wherever deemed necessary. There is a subtle humour which enlivens the whole narrative of 615 verses.

In Bhakti-pradipa (The lamp of devotion) in 308 verses Sankaradeva develops the principal tenets of his cult urging his followers to seek salvation mainly through the recounting of God's name, and interdicts them strictly from the worship of the deity other than the Supreme in the form of a dialogue between Krishna and Arjuna. The work professes to have Garuda-purana as its source, although in the available editions of the purana there is nothing like the contents of this poem.

Rukmini-harana-kavya (Abduction of Rukmini, in 795 verses) is one of the most popular works in Assamese literature and many of its passages have until recent times been memorised by illiterate women folk in the villages and used for marriage songs. Its language is homely and colloquial. Out of the shadowy figures in the original Sanskrit texts, the poet creates living men and women who hold our attention.

Sankaradeva's Kirtana-ghosha (The book of songs and refrains), with 189 kirtanas and as many refrains, in 2,264 verses, forms one of the corner-stones of Assam Vaishnavism along with his Bhagavata X (Purvardha), Madhavadeva's Nama-ghosha, and his verse rendering of Vishnupuri Sanyasi's Bhagavata-bhakti-ratnavali. The book is a typical form of Vaishnava poetry.

Bhagavata I, in 421 verses, gives a summary of the first book of the purana. Bhagavata II is an incomplete analysis, of the contents of the original in only 262 verses. Sankaradeva's description of the divine activities of Sri Rama and Krishna, and of Vaikuntha, the celestial abode of the Lord, however, afford 'purple patches' in this otherwise dry account.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Anadi-patan (The tale of creation) is one of the important works of the saint, giving his views on cosmology, philosophy and theology. It is a well-knit and handy work in 300 verses, acquainting us with the relevant topics in an eclectic manner. The sources are said to be Bhagavata-purana III, and Vamana-purana, but the contents do not betray relationship with the printed editions of the latter purana. The work describes the position of the earth on water surrounding the universe, the destructive activity of god Rudra, the creative process employed by Brahma and the creation of this world through maya or illusion, the luminaries in the sky, the progress of time and different nether regions (naraka).

In Bhagavata VI, or Ajamilopakhyana (426 verses), the poet raises hell's furies before our eyes and shows that simple repetition of God's name can save us from the consequences of a thousand sins. The story is here told of the 'fallen' brahmin, Ajamila, who was rescued from the dire hands of the executioners of Yama by the angel attendants of Vishnu, as this great sinner passionately uttered the name of his youngest child, which happened to be 'Narayana'.

Sankaradeva re-tells two stories from Bhagavata-purana VIII in his two works, Amrita-mathan and Bali-chalana with a total of 1,354 verses. The first describes the churning of the sea by the gods with the help of the demon sons of Diti primarily to rescue goddess Lakshmi from its bottom, and concerns itself with the three manifestations of Vishnu. This work holds much evidence of Sankaradeva's poetic imagination and skill in organisation.

The contents of Bali-chalana (The deceiving of Bali) are taken mainly from Bhagavata-purana; but, 'like sweetening milk with honey', as the poet himself says, the story is strengthened with elements picked from Vamana-purana (possibly in a recension different from the available printed editions).

Bhagavata X (Purvardha), in 2,263 verses, is another work which renders the tale of Krishna's early life in lovely and glowing verses, and its language is fully mature. The rendering is generally faithful to the original, but Sankaradeva depends a great deal upon the commentary of Sridhara Swami for his material though he weaves new matter into the texture of his work. Sankaradeva's power of description and narration is perhaps at its best in this work.

Kurukshetra (602 verses) is based on a few chapters of the Uttarardha of the tenth book of Bhagavata-purana. It describes the meeting of Krishna and Balarama with Nanda, Yashoda and the gopis of Braja in the battle-field of Kurukshetra. The eight principal consorts of Krishna tell Draupadi and other ladies the tale of their marriages. Then comes the philosophical passage of Vasudeva's hymn to Krishna and the work closes with a description of Krishna and Balarama bringing back Devaki's six dead sons to her for a short duration.

Nimi-nava-siddha-samvada (King Nimi meets the nine sages) is an adaptation in 427 verses from chapters ii-v of the scholarly talks given by the nine Siddhas in reply to nine questions put by King Nimi. All the queries bear upon bhakti and nivritti.

Bhagavata XI (846 verses), or Krishna-prayana Pandava-niryana, as more aptly called in the body of the text, is based on Bhagavata-purana. (Books I and II). It narrates the passing of Krishna, the annihilation of the Yadavas brought upon them by their own acts of indiscretion, the miserable plight of Krishna's consorts at the hands of the degraded cowherds of Braja, the unbounded sorrow of Uddhava, Arjuna, the gopis and others at the disappearance of their beloved Lord, and the death of the Pandavas. This is one of the maturest works of Sankaradeva and ably represents his mind and art, his poetic virtuosity as well as the tenets of his creed.

Bhagavata XII, in 538 verses, is a free adaptation of the twelfth book of the purana, some of the contents of which are left out apparently as they do not conform to Sankara's religious practices. The philosophical passages are rendered with much dexterity and clarity of vision and understanding.

Gunamala (A garland of the glories of Vishnu-Krishna) is a tiny work in six kirtana-ghoshas with a total of 378 jingling verses with four feet of six syllables in each verse. It is a remarkable feat of mental agility, trying to maintain a swift-moving metre all through. With initial salutations to Narayana the book gives a quick survey of Krishna's earthly career.

The Bargitas (Uttara-kanda, 761 verses) with Madhavadeva's Adi-kanda, was meant to supplement the five-cantoed work of their predecessor Madhava Kandali. The saint-poet himself calls his work Uttarakanda-katha-sara (the essence of the final book of the Ramayana) and gives a sort of analysis of the original book, divesting it of all intervening episodes.

The dramas (anka, nata, nataka) of Sankaradeva are a type by themselves and do not follow a particular model, Sanskrit or Prakrit. There are no act or scene divisions in them. The Sutradhara appears on the stage, announces the drama and conducts the whole show with dances, songs and explanatory commentary all through. The plays themselves are in an artificial dialect, which has since been called Assamese Brajabuli (a queer mixture of Assamese, Maithili and Hindi with a tincture of other elements), and which is characterised by flexibility, phonetic sweetness and malleability suited to the needs of poetic drama. It is intervened only by Sanskrit shlokas and the early Assamese payaras (verses), though rarely, with a plaintive motif. In the dramas we get the first specimens of Assamese prose, but characterised by a poetical sonority.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Vipra-patni-prasada (The offerings of the wives of the priestly Brahmins to Krishna) was written by Sankara at Belaguri (Sibsagar district), when the Brahminical hostility to his namadharma was at its bitterest. The rather thin story has been adapted from a single chapter of Bhagavata-purana X and criticises sacerdotalism quite severely.

Kali-damana-yatra (The taming of the serpent Kaliya) dramatises the Bhagavata stories of Krishna's feats, like taming the demon-serpent Kaliya, who poisoned the waters of a lake on the Yamuna, or swallowing the forest fire of Vrindavana (vanagni-pana). The pathetic sentiment is finely developed as the first incident is unravelled.

Keli-Gopala or Rasa-krida (The rasa sports of Krishna) depicts the scenes of Krishna's sports with the milkmaids of Braja. The erotic sentiment here holds the ground, while the heroic note intervenes in Krishna's killing the Yaksha, called Shankhachuda.

Rukmini-harana-nataka has the union of Krishna and Rukmini, who came to be his first wife, as its main subject. The love and battle scenes are wrought with equal verve and beauty, but purely as a piece of drama the work suffers because of the dominance of music and dance, which precludes a full development of plot and characters.

Parijata-haran has two plots, namely, the killing of Narakasura and the uprooting of the divine parijata tree from the garden of Indra. Sankaradeva is at his best here among his plays in point of characterization. The character of Narada comes out real, and Satyabhama and Shachi quarrel heartily with each other like real women, much to the amusement of the common audience.

Rama-vijaya (The conquests of Rama) is the only work with the datemark of the saint, being written in the last year of his life. It was first presented on the stage in the Koch capital with Chilaray's men (a band of actors) in different roles under the poet's own direction. The story of Parashuram and of Rama and Lakshmana's fights against Tadaka and other demons is taken from the Ramayana, but the plot is developed with much originality in characterization.

Sankaradeva is a great literary figure, who presents a whole cultural upsurge. As a rich legacy from his 'unerring predecessors', he received a literary form of language with much poise and beauty as also a few verse-forms. He enlarged the scope of the language with the boldness of a creative genius, coined the novel idiom of Brajabuli, and added to the variety of verse-forms. The immediately preceding period of Assamese literature exhibits an unprecedented zeal for story-telling, when the two great Indian epics and some of the puranas were rendered into Assamese at least in parts, but the period hardly represents a literary movement with a purpose. The age of Sankaradeva marks a literary and cultural resurgence. The neo-Vaishnavism preached by Sankaradeva brought in its train a literary upheaval, and the fine arts like music, dance and painting also came to have their place in the life of the people.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Lakshminath Bezbaroa, Sri Sankaradeva (Calcutta, 1936); Maheswar Neog, Sankaradeva and His Times (Gauhati, 1966).

M.N.

SANKARAN NAMBIAR, P. (Malayalam; b.1892, d.1954). Well-versed in Sanskrit, English and Malayalam, P.Sankaran Nambiar has given 'the little gold, instead of much silver' to Malayalam poetry. He was a distinguished professor of English, talented essayist and critic. He entered the literary field while he was a student, writing Palazhimathanam champu. His Bhashasahityacharitra sangraham (1922) is an extensive and critical study of the various forms of Malayalam literature from the very beginning. Abhinava kavyadarsham (1928), which he wrote under the pseudonym 'Prapushnacharyar', assesses the qualitative degradation in poetry. The technique of odes, sonnets and monologues used in English poetry is explained in his Prasthanatrayam giving appropriate examples in Malayalam. More than that, he translated some well-known English poems into elegant Malayalam verse. Some of these translations, first published in periodicals, are collected in Suvarnamandalam (Realms of gold, 1951). Each poem has an introduction to give the readers an idea of the background. Tennyson's 'Ulysses', Milton's 'Lycidas', Brownings's 'Andrea del Sarto', Shelley's 'Ode to the West Wind', Wordsworth's 'Ode to Duty', Shakespeare's seven sonnets, and adaptations of Keats's 'Ode to a Nightingale' and Goldsmith's 'Apostrophe to Poetry' are included in the collection. Collections of his literary essays have been published in four books, Sahityanishkutam, Sahitya prakashika (in three parts), Makarandamanjari and Sahityavum samskaravum. In recognition of his contribution to literature the Maharaja of Cochin conferred on him the title of 'Kavitilakan'.

O.M.A.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

SANKHYAYANA SARMA, VENKATA (Telugu; b. 1864, d. 1933) belonged to village Achanta in Godavari district, but the family migrated to Kichchada in Visakhapatnam district in his father's time. He became proficient in Sanskrit and Telugu in his childhood itself. His talent was multi-faceted. He attained a level of proficiency in music, dance, painting and poetry. He was good in the art of public speaking, and passed the Vakil's examination. He had his legal practice in the Munsiff's court at Parvathipuram, and also worked as the Dewan of Merangi principality in the Parvatipur region.

He founded a periodical, Sujanapramodini, in 1881 and another named Kalpalatha in 1903, and published varied articles on science in these papers. He wrote poems including 'Sudhanidhi' and 'Manorama', and two plays, Partha Parajam and Avadata kalabhakam. He translated into Telugu Kalidasa's Vikramorvashiya and Bhavabhuti's Uttararamacharita. He published a collection of essays on science, titled Rahasyadarpanam. He also wrote a volume of poems entitled Andhra padyavali.

He was also known as Venkata Raya Sankhyayana Sarma. He presided over Andhra Saraswata Sabha in 1933 and the thirteenth annual conference of Andhra Sahitya Parishat in 1924. He was honoured with the title 'Mahopadhyaya' by the Andhra Saraswata Sabha at Nanduru.

V.S.K.A.

SANKRITYAYAN, RAHUL (Hindi; b.1893, d.1963), a versatile genius—novelist, playwright, biographer, essayist, linguist, thinker—was born in village Pandraha, district Azamgarh (Uttar Pradesh). His original name was Kedarnath Pandey. Fond of wandering from childhood, he travelled far and wide in the country and abroad. His life was a saga of varied activities. A widely read scholar, he was well versed in philosophy, religion, literature, history, archaeology and political science. He participated in social work, Satyagraha, freedom struggle, labour movement and peasant uprisings, and lived fitfully a life of farming, landlordism, priesthood, political leadership, communism, renunciation. From Sanatan dharma (conservatism) to Arya Samaj, from Arya Samaj to Buddhism, then to Marxism, and finally to the Religion of Man—this makes the curve in his Faith. His philosophy of life should be examined in the broad spectrum of these multi-dimensional phases of thinking and living. As a sanyasi, he went into the Himalayas. In quest of learning and in order to satisfy his wanderlust, he travelled far into Europe and Asia. A number of times he visited Tibet, China, Russia and Sri Lanka, and brought from there a rich treasure of manuscripts.

His literary career started in 1927 and then his pen, like his feet, knew no rest. He has some 160 works to his credit, ranging from novel, drama, essay, biography, autobiography, religion, philosophy, history, politics, folk-literature, travelogue, translation, commentary on Sanskrit classics, lexicon and editing of Tibetan and palm-leaf manuscripts, etc.

Among his works on Hindi language and literature may be mentioned, in particular, Apabhramsha kavya sahitya, Dakkhini Hindi sahitya, Adi Hindi kahaniyan and Hindi kavyadhara. He gave a new direction to the study of old Hindi literature. First, he maintained that this early age shows two contrary literary trends; first, the religious literature of the Buddhist Siddhas and Jain ascetics, and secondly, the heroic and amorous poetry of the court poets. He, therefore, argued that this age should be called 'Siddha-samanta yuga'. Moreover, by including Apabhramsha works in the over-all literature of this period, he took this age back to the 8th century instead of keeping it confined to 1050-1375 (Vikram Samvat) as ordinarily accepted by other literary historians.

Rahul Sankrityayan is also well known for his historical novels in Hindi. Among his five novels, Singh senapati and Jai Yaudheya deserve a special mention. These novels re-create the cultural and historical life of the older times. Singh senapati tries to bring out the principles of socialism through a study of an ancient republic, while Jai Yaudheya, written in an autobiographical style, depicts the conflict between the republican and monarchical systems.

Rahul Sankrityayan's social novel Baaisvin sadi presents a utopiean society based on the postulates of communism, while his Jivan ke liye is a study of man's struggle against the odds of life. In his short stories the writer touches the unexplored areas of ancient history and contemporary society. His collections of short stories Saptami ke bachche and Kanaila ki katha reveal his fascination for the past, intertwined with regional colours and local flavour.

His essays collected in Sahitya nibandhavali and Puratatva nibandhavali deal mostly with literature and ancient history and archaeology, and are marked by clarity of thought and fluency of style. He has also written travelogues and biographical literature. The collections Yatra nibandhavali, Yatra ka panne, Bachapan ki smritiyan, Tumhari kshaya contain about seventy essays—narrative, reflective, or descriptive. His autobiography Meri jiwan yatra is a fascinating account, in a simple and idiomatic language, of a life of rich experiences. In addition to this, he has also attempted reportage.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In his treatment of history, Rahul Sankrityayan gives weightage to the life of the common man. He goes to the roots of the religious movements and tries to reach out to the faith and belief of the ordinary people. The masses, their thinking, their life, their government, their toil—they dominate his writings. At the level of language also, he prefers a direct and simple style as against an ornate one.

A Marxist to the core, Rahul Sankrityayan was no sectarian. He wrote for the common, suffering humanity. During his imprisonment in 1942, he wrote eight plays in Bhojpuri which aimed at awakening the peasants and giving momentum to the Kisan movement. Works like Bhago nahin duniya ko badalo, Manava samaj, and Vaijnanika bhautikavad were written for the struggling masses. Among his other works mention may be made of Madhya Asia ka itihas in two parts, an important piece of research which received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1958.

His important works, other then those mentioned above, include: Novel: Madhur swapna; Short Stories: Volga se Ganga tak; Memoirs and Biography: Rajasthan ranivas, Atit se vartaman, Stalin, Karl Marx, Lenin, Ghumakkar Swami, Jinaka mein kritjna; Philosophy: Darshan digdarshan, Buddha darshan; Travelogues: Meri Laddakh yatra, Meri Europe yatra, Meri Tibet yatra, Roos main pachchis mas; Editing: Dakkhini Hindi kavyadhara, Saraha doha kosh.

Gov. R.

SANKUNNI, KOTTARATTIL (Malayalam; b. 1855, d. 1937). Vasudevan Unni, known popularly as Sankunni and born in Kottayam, was practically illiterate till he was sixteen. The next thirteen years saw him avidly learning a number of graded Sanskrit 'kavyas' and grammar books and a few treatises on Ayurveda. In 1890 when the daily Malayala manorama was started, the manager put him in charge of its poetry section. Three years later he was appointed Malayalam pandit in a newly started high school in Kottayam itself. He held both the posts concurrently, and also took interest in attending literary conferences, getting acquainted with the eminent men of letters of the age and participating, almost always with success, in poetic contests.

A prolific writer with about forty five works to his credit, Sankunni contributed to almost all branches of literature—original compositions, translations and adaptations. His translation of Bhavabhuti's Malati-Madhava is acclaimed as his best contribution. Devi vilasam, based on the Bible, is a drama. Besides these, there are also a number of short and long poems including a 'kilippattu', a 'tullal', a verse biography, as well as five 'attakkathas'. His poetic style is simple and lucid. Clarity, spontaneity and melliflousousness characterise most of his poems.

Most significant of all his works is a set of eight volumes entitled Aitihyamala, a collection of legends. Besides being written in a delightfully readable style, these volumes contain a wealth of information useful to researchers interested in reconstructing the cultural history of Kerala even after due allowance has been made for its unauthencity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer, Kerala sahitya charitram, Vol. IV. (1955).

K.S.N.

SANKUNNI NAIR, M.P. (Malayalam; b.1917), regarded as a major critic in Malayalam, is a native of Mezhathoor near Pattambi. A brilliant scholar holding the title Siromani in Sanskrit and an M.A. degree, he has had a long and distinguished teaching career in Pachayyappa's College, Madras. After retirement from service, he is fully engaged in literary pursuits.

Sankunni Nair is neither a prolific nor a creative writer, in the ordinary sense. But he has used his erudition and exercised his sharp intellect to produce a few substantial works illustrating how research and criticism could be harmonized and integrated. His first notable work is Kavyavyulpatti, a collection of six essays, each evaluating a well-known Malayalam poem. His latest Chhathravum chamarvavum is an attempt to acquaint the reader with the poetic vision and philosophy of Kalidasa from a refreshingly new point of view. Nalla bhumi, his Malayalam rendering of Pearl S. Buck's The Good Earth, is also worth mentioning.

T.G.R.P.

SANNA KATHEGALU 12 & 13 (Kannada), by 'Srinivasa' (Masti Venkatesh Iyengar) are two volumes of short stories, published in 1965 and 1967, which won the Sahitya Akademi Award for Kannada in 1968. The short stories, fifteen in all, fall into two groups. The stories in the first group celebrate the value of plain living and high thinking, while those in the second group explore the complexity of the relationship of love between man and woman. Plutarch's preceptor in 'Hesaru sayuvudilla' declares that one should forswear wealth if one has to live in the light of truth. Kuchela in 'Kuchelana bhagya' prefers to go back to his life of austere simplicity when Krishna offers riches and the prospect of luxurious living. How attachment and affection complicate the act of renunciation is well brought out in one of the finest stories in Masti's entire corpus, 'Tolstoy Maharshiya bhoorja vrikshagalu' wherein Masti depicts the ambivalence of Tolstoy's feelings when a grove of birch trees is allowed to be cut down for the benefit of his serfs according to his principle of non-ownership. The theme expands to cover the destiny of nations when covetousness corrodes the character of nations and leads them to ruin in such a story as 'Ketta kala'.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In the second group of stories, Masti presents varieties of love relationships. 'Vichitra prema', celebrates the great passion of Voltaire's life, his love for Madame du Chatelet. Masti highlights her relations with the three men in her life—her complaisant husband, Voltaire, the great intellectual, and M.de Saint Lambert, the handsome young man who wins her love towards the end of her life. The story illustrates how the perfect mutual understanding of the four led to a life of full satisfaction—material satisfaction, satisfaction of the spirit and satisfaction of the senses—for her. The story shows how open-minded Masti could be, though one feels that the situation is overmuch idealised. 'Nartakiya parabhava' presents the dialectics of free love vs. responsible love much more objectively in the dramatic cut and thrust of dialogue between Isadora Duncon, the American dancer and Stanislavsky, the Russian actor and director, who declines to reciprocate her feelings. To her claim that she is being modern he retorts that she is not sufficiently modern.

The odd story in these two collections and one of Masti's best, 'Iruvegala loka', an allegorical fable about queen ants set in the context of the epic story of the Ramayana, serves by implication to forewarn Dasharatha about Kaikeyi's potential for overwhelming and routing Kaushalya. Stories like 'Tolstoy Maharshiya bhoorja vrikshagalu' and 'Iruvegala loka' present the foremost short story writer in Kannada at the peak of his powers in his seventies, while stories like 'Kuchelana bhagya' and 'Ketta kala' reveal his profound concern for his country and the world.

K.N.M

SANSKARTA, NANURAM (Rajasthani; b.1916) was born in village Khari, district Bikaner, and was moderately educated in Hindi and worked as a village school teacher. Being born in a village and having lived there all his life, he has an intimate knowledge of rural life, of its environment and seasons and the reality of life as lived by the common man. His language too has a colloquial touch which differs in nuances from the language written by others. He has more than a dozen books to his credit, some of which are well spoken of. His Rajasthani works are: Poetry: Kalayan (1949), Samaya bayaro (1952); Das deva (1955), Chappaya satsai (1972), Sankal sandhan (1973), Lankan dhani (1976); Stories: Gyohi (1957), Das dokh (1966), Ghar ki rel (1969), Ghar ki gai. His Batohi, a poetical work, is in Hindi. His thesis on Rajasthani folk literature got him the degree of 'Sahitya Mahopadhyaya' from Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, Prayag. He also received an award on his book Kalayan. A survey of the countryside has also been published by him under the title Khedai rapat. He has recently been honoured as an eminent writer in the cultural field by the Rajasthani Bhasha, Sahitya evam Sanskriti Akademi, Bikaner. Nanuram's language, though colloquial, is extremely rich and his approach to subject non-conventional.

S.N.J.

SANTALINGA SWAMIKAL (Tamil; b. 18th c.) was a Tamil poet and saint. Though the full details of his life are not available, it is learnt that he was a Virashaiva in religious belief. He is believed to have belonged to Tirtturayur. He was a student and disciple of Sivaprakasa Swamikal, and spent his life in a hermitage at Tirupporur. He had a favourite disciple, called Chitambara Swamikal, who wrote notes on some of his poems. His chief poetical works are Kolai maruttal (Against taking life), a poem in twenty-two stanzas; Vairekkiya dhipam (Light of renunciation) in two sections of fifty verses each; and Avirota untiyar, a poem having a hundred three-lined stanzas. Expressed briefly and beautifully, his poem deals with themes like dharma, artha, kama and moksha. Out of these, he hails moksha as the most important. He believed that the one who knows God knows all, and that even one's body is not one's own. He also maintains that one should not crave for good food, clothing or habitation. The poet's similes are appropriate and homely, e.g. as itching makes one scratch more, so does lust beget more lust. He compares a man, seeking to dispel the darkness of Maya with his little knowledge, to one who seeks entry to his house in a dark night with the help of a glow-worm's light.

R.B.

SANTOKH SINGH, BHAI (Punjabi; b. 1787, d. 1849), a great poet and historian, was born in Nur Di Saran, a historic village in Amritsar district. He studied languages, Sikh religion, six schools of Indian philosophy, history and poetics under Gyani Sant Singh, a well-known Sikh scholar of Amritsar, and spent five years in Kashi to do an in-depth study of Sanskrit language and other branches of Hindu-lore. Attracted by his attainments, Bhagwan Singh, the Chief of Buria, a Sikh principality near Jagadhari (Haryana). conferred on him the honour of Poet Laureate. It was here that he completed Nama kosh (1821), being the translation in bhasha of Amar kosh, and Shri Guru Nanak Prakash (1823), an epic on the founder of Sikhism. In 1825, he migrated to Kaithal at the invitation of its chief, Uday Singh. Well-settled, he wrote ad seriatim, Garab ganjani (1829), a commentary on the Japa of Guru Nanak in which he rebutted Sadhu Anandaghana's formulations about the Guru's composition, a commentary on Atma purana, (1834), which is now untraceable, and his magnum opus, Gurpratap suraj (1843), which took eight strenuous years of work to complete. He also translated Valmiki's Ramayana into Punjabi.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Bhai had used Braji in Gurumukhi characters as the medium of his literary work. It would have been difficult for Sikh laymen to understand the poet's text, but soon after his death, the daily exposition (katha) of Nanak Prakash and Suraj Prakash (abbr. for Gurpratap suraj) became the routine of Sikh religious establishments. He is acclaimed as the greatest poet of Braji ever produced by Punjab. His perfect grip over his linguistic medium, the large variety of metres and figures of speech, so dexterously used by him, coupled with the flights of his fertile imagination excel his capacity to sift facts from fiction, yet his two historical masterpieces, which actually form one continuous whole, continue to serve as perennial sources of inspiration to the Sikhs and a rich mine of information for students of the Sikh history.

Pr.S.

SANTOSH, GHULAM RASOOL (Kashmiri; b. 1929), a poet, prose writer, playwright and artist, was born in a Shia Muslim family of average means. He had to discontinue his school studies to support his family. He joined the Progressive Artists Association in 1950 and remained an active participant in all its activities. He started his career as a poet in 1956 and participated in mushairas and other literary activities vigorously. In the beginning, he wrote in Urdu and published a novel Samundar pyasa hai (1964), but immediately thereafter switched over to writing exclusively in Kashmiri.

For some time, Santosh was under the spell of progressivism but, in due course of time, he turned to Kashmiri Shaivism which is explicitly reflected in his poetry and paintings. His poetry represents a continuation of the poetic tradition of Lal Ded and Nand Rishi in form as well as in content, He is a major modern exponent of mystic tradition. He has been keenly interested in the development of Kashmiri language and literature, and in 1967 he started and edited a monthly journal, Kashur adab, which was closed down after about two years.

A collection of his poems, Be sukh rooh, was published in 1977, which brought him the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1978. Other works to his credit are Gulrez, an opera, and Butt te buldozer, a play.

He is an artist of international repute and recipient of the Lalit Kala Akademi Award, the Governor of Bombay Award, the Kashmir Government Award and the Kalidasa Jayanti Award. In poetry, his 'Bahri-i-Tavil' is a new experiment which reflects his present mode of thinking and approach. He has always employed colour and form—a specific imagery—in his poems. Some of his poems, therefore, surface themselves as perfect word pictures.

Santosh was a member of the Central Committee of State Cultural Academy for about a decade, and a member of the Lalit Kala Akademi. He was also honoured by the President with the title of Padmashri.

Mo.S.

SANTRAM (Hindi, b. 1887, d. 1983) was born at Purani Vasi in the Hoshiarpur district of Punjab. He studied Urdu and Persian, and only after doing B.A. started learning Hindi at the call of Swami Dayanand.

He considered Mahavirprasad Dwivedi as his mentor and teacher in the field of writing. Dwivedi edited a number of his articles and published them in Saraswati. Santram read them closely as corrected and polished by Dwivediji, and achieved such a high degree of proficiency in Hindi that in 1912 he received the Radhakrishna Das Memorial Medal for his essay, 'Hindi bhasha tatha Nagari aksharon ki unnati ke upaya'.

There is a natural flow and ease in his language because of his knowledge of both Hindi and Urdu. His first and foremost aim being social reform, there is a certain vigour also in his expression. Most of his writings are on social and historical subjects. His main works are Alberuni ka Bharat, I'tsing ki Bharat yatra, Dayanand, Hamara samaj, Udbodhini, Veer Peshwa, and Vishva ki vibhutian. He contributed a lot to children's literature also. Besides, he also wrote literature on the development of man's inner and spiritual life. Some of his popular books on this subject are Atma-sudhar, Ekagrata and Divya shastra.

In Hamara samaj he has taken up the subject of caste system, and his study is based on his long experience of thirty-five years of social work. His aim was to root out the evil of casteism and discrimination from the Indian society—an objective which inspired many of his writings. He made Lahore the centre of his social crusade and in

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

1922 established a 'Jat-pant todak mandal' for eradicating casteism. His work in this direction was even lauded by Mahatma Gandhi, Motilal Nehru, B.R. Ambedkar and Swami Shraddhanand. He started two periodicals also, Kranti in Urdu and Yugantara in Hindi, to fight for the cause of the weaker sections of society.

Santram was honoured by several organisations for his pioneering work. The then Government of Punjab gave him awards for his books Alberuni ka Bharat, I'Tsing ki Bharat yatra and Shishtachar. The Rashtra-bhasha Prachar Samiti, Vardha, gave him the Mahatma Gandhi Award (1958), meant for a non-Hindi scholar for his contribution to Hindi language. The present Punjab Government also gave him an award of Rs. 1101/- for his writings. Santram, indeed, lived and wrote with a sense of social commitment and dedication.

V.P.

SANYAL, PROBODH KUMAR (Bengali; b. 1905, d. 1983) was born at Calcutta, and had his schooling at Mahakali Pathshala and Scottish Church School and collegiate education at City College, Calcutta. He worked successively as volunteer in the Non-cooperation Movement, as fish trader, and as clerk in a post-office, in the printing press and in the military accounts office (1923-1927). He was an active worker in the freedom movement (1928-30) and an assistant editor with such literary journals as Kallol, Dunduv, Upasana, Bijoli, Swadesh and Kheyali. He edited Jugantar Sunday Magazine (1937-1941) before eventually becoming a whole-time writer. He was also a great traveller who travelled widely in India and abroad, and the hills had a particular fascination for him.

Probodhkumar published some seventy titles over a span of half a century. His first literary endeavour, an article, was published in the journal Sankha (1921), the first short story 'Marjana' in Kallol (1923), and his first book Jajabar (The nomad), a series of sketches, in 1927.

The effect of the aftermath of First World War in India was an upsurge in political consciousness. Also in Calcutta, as in our provincial towns, there was a steady flow of people from villages. Some young writers started writing about slum life in the city and in the suburbs. They initiated a new movement in literature and brought out a monthly, Kallol (Rippling current), edited by Gokulchandra Nag and Dineshranjan Das in 1923. Within five years two monthly journals came out in its wake, Kali kalam (Ink and Pen, 1927) from Calcutta and Progati (Progress, 1928) from Dhaka. Probodhkumar was intimately connected with Kallol and Kali kalam. He published in these periodicals a number of short stories which were subsequently collected into a book Nishipadma (Lotus at night, 1931). His first book Jajabar was also serialised in Kallol. They were followed by another book Kajal-lata (1931) and Kalarab (Loud telling, 1932). The novel Priya bandhabi (Dear friend, 1933) came with a bang. By this time Sanyal had become an established writer of novels and short stories. He made his mark as an able writer of travelogues when Maha prasthaner pathe (On way to great departure) came out (1933).

Probodhkumar set the tone of his novels in Priya bandhabi (1933)—the story of a young pair who roam about together but are not married. They are bohemian in their habits and a little wayward in their thinking, but they caught the public imagination as popular characters. In Nada o nadi (The large and the small rivers, 1938) and Anka banka (The zigzag, 1939) the same story-formula is repeated. In Hasu Banu (1952), however, we get a serious novel based on the bloody events of the partition of India in which the heroine, the young Muslim girl in the title, tries in vain to stop the wanton cruelty between the Hindus and the Muslims.

Probodhkumar has written a good number of belle lettres and memoirs, such as Mone mone (1941), Jala kallol (1945) and Tuchchha (1953), besides his autobiographical magnum opus Vanaspatir baithake (1971) in which a whole life-time has been ably portrayed.

Probodhkumar is specially happy in his books on travel. His first book on travel was Mahaprasthaner pathe (1933), followed by Devatatma Himalaya (1955), Uttar Himalaya charit (1965), Russiar diary (1962), Ganga pathey Gangotri (1962) and Dakshin Bharater anginay (1984). Jawaharlal Nehru wrote a Foreword to Devatatma Himalaya in which he said, 'The author of this book, Probodhkumar Sanyal, has evidently been very much in tune with these great friends and companions of ours (mountain ranges of the Himalayas). I envy him his many journeys. Others, who read this book, may be helped by it to gain some insight into their charm and realise somewhat the fascination they have exercised through the ages for innumerable generations of the people of our country'. Sanyal, indeed, was an impassive observer of nature all his life and caught its charm in his travelogues.

A.M.

SAPKOTA, PADMANABH (Nepali), pseudonym Bigyan Bilash, was a novelist. He passed the Entrance examination from Durbar school, Kathmandu, and took his B.A. degree from Patna. He commenced his literary career in 1914 with articles contributed to such journals as Chandra and Gorkhali, published from Varanasi.

His detective novel, Dr. Surya Prasad (1915), though incomplete, has all the ingredients of a thriller — organised story, suspense, use of scientific gadgets and chemical substances, and familiar setting of Nepal. He also wrote a book on Nepalese history on the pattern of R.C. Dutt's History of India. What makes his book much sought after is not only its language but also the article entitled 'The Short Sketch of the Parbatiya Language and Literature' included in the Introduction to the book. Another thought-provoking article of Padmanabh appeared in Gorkhali (a weekly Nepali journal from Varanasi), entitled 'Matribhasa', where he tried to prove that Nepali language is the outcome of the interplay of many social and political forces. 'Nepal ko arthasastra' (Economics of Nepal) is yet another article which appeared in Chandra (1915). His Jivan charitra (1916) consists of the biographies of Ashoka, Shankaracharya, General Garfield and Rana Pratap, with the story of Maharani Priyambada added to it at the end.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

His poem entitled 'Rekha pari neerko' (Line of tears, 1915) depicts through beautiful imagery the subtle charm of love, the pleasant effect of which lingers long in the heart.

M.B.P.

SAPTAMA RITU (Oriya) is the fourth collection of poems (1977) by the eminent Oriya poet, Ramakanta Ratha, which received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1978. Saptama ritu (seventh season) contains 39 poems and a postscript in prose which attempts to define the nature and function of great literature. According to the poet-critic, great literature must embody the self-realisation of a life beyond man's material existence, a life redeemed by an anguished search for truth. For an example he takes the eighteenth-century Oriya classic, Mathuramangala by Bhaktacharana Das and analyses it in some detail. The love of Yashoda and the gopis for Krishna, as portrayed in Mathuramangala, is seen as the human soul's craving for communion with a higher reality. In contrast the desires of Kansa and Uddhava are earth-bound and self-centred. For Ratha the anguish involved in the search is far more valuable than its outcome. This sustains great literature and ultimately human civilisation.

As in his earlier three collections, here too the theme is time and its transcendence. Each of the 39 poems offers a symbolic account of the poet's encounter with 'our sad fate' or Death who appears now as a sanyasi clad in torn clothes, now as a lunatic carying a sword dripping with blood, or playing cards all alone in a desolate mountain cave. Every experience is an experience of death, even that of smoking a cigarette or taking a stroll in the evening. The season is the seventh season, the season of death, in which everything moves fast towards dissolution. The world is on the verge of disappearing altogether, and its haste, its frenzy, is very well captured in the swift moving rhythm of the lines. The idea of a future, deathless and illumined by heavenly light ('Duradrushti'), is rejected by the poet in a very casual manner. Saptama ritu is an authentic record of man's existential anguish, the anguish 'that compels a re-examination of our ideas about our destiny' ('Postscript'), but not many readers can stand, not to say appreciate, its nightmarish, almost morbid, version of reality.

S.K.M.

'SAQI', MOTI LAL (Kashmiri; b.1936) is an eminent poet, critic and research scholar. He graduated from Kashmir University and joined Government service. Shortly afterwards, he joined Radio Kashmir, and presently he is working as Assistant Editor, Encyclopaedia Kashmiriana, sponsored by the State Cultural Academy. 'Saqi' is known for his researches and recovery of the old annals and manuscripts. He has deciphered the 'shrukhs' of Nund Rishi (1377-1441), 'Leelas' of Parmanand (1791-1874), and discovered the classical works of Karam Buland (1765-1855), Swachi Kral and Shah Qalandar (d. 1750). Besides Kashmiri, 'Saqi' has written a number of articles in Hindi, English and Urdu on subjects like folklore, folk-art, crafts, architecture and literature. He has also edited the journals, Son adab and Koshur akhbar.

'Saqi' is a prolific writer and his works include: (Kashmiri language) Kashiri luka bath (Folk-songs of Kashmir), 5 volumes, published by State Cultural Academy, during 1964-1968; Mudari khwab (Sweet dreams, 1965), a collection of songs; Parmanand, 2 vols. (ed.) (Collective works of poet Parmanand); Kulyati Samad Mir (ed.) (Poetry of Samad Mir, 1973); Gashri (Biographies and criticism of Kashmiri poets, 1974); Kulyat-i-Sheikh-ul-Aalam (collection of shrukhs of Nund Rishi 1980-81); Aanuvan (Research, 1975); Aan kawan (critical essays, 1976); Vyath chhe grazan aagray (1977); Mansar (1979), a collection of poems which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1981. In Urdu: Kashmir mein secularism (1966).

Ba. A.

SARAB LOH GRANTH (Punjabi) is known by two names, viz. Mangla charan puran (as titled by the author himself) and Sarab Loh (after the name of its main character). It is usually attributed to the Tenth Master, Guru Gobind Singh, but the internal evidence shows that this work was composed after the death of the Tenth Guru. Till recently, it was only in manuscript form, but by the efforts of Nihang Chief of 'Budha Dal' it is now available in printed form.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The work is divided into five chapters. The first four chapters form its first half and the fifth chapter, which is comparatively very lengthy, is the second half. In the first chapter of 754 stanzas, the theme concerns the defeat of gods by demons, gods rushing to goddess 'Devi' for help and the goddess' battle with the demons. The second chapter, consisting of 881 stanzas, deals with the battle of Brijnad or Veerianad. In the third chapter of 263 stanzas, is depicted the battle of Veerianad with Indra and other gods under his command. The fourth chapter deals with the fierce fighting between the demons and the gods, in which Indra is defeated and Veerianad, the commander of the demons, occupies Indrapuri. The theme of the fifth chapter pertains to the battle between the demons and Sarab Loh, who is an incarnation of Mahakal, and has come to the rescue of the gods. After a prolonged battle, Sarab Loh defeats the demons and re-establishes the kingdom of the gods.

The language of this work is mainly Braj, but many other languages have also been used extensively, and as such much of the text is not intelligible to the common reader. It is actually war poetry, and vivid scenes of battlefield are its great charm. The work seems likely to be inspired by the theme of the Dasam Granth, because it was the need of the hour to prepare the community for self-protection and to resist oppression forcefully.

R.S.J.

SARABHAI, BHARATI (English; b. 1912), was born in London, and came from a well-known family of Ahmedabad industrialists. She obtained her postgraduate degree from Bombay University and became the Principal of Shreyas College, Ahmedabad.

Bharati Sarabhai wrote during the troubled pre-Independence era. Her two plays, The Well of the People (1943) and Two Women (1952) reflect her response to the frustrations and aspirations of Indians during a period of transition. The first play is a record of the lives of men and women who belong to a period between the launching of Gandhiji's movement and the achievement of India's independence. The Well of the People records the experience of the author in the Nilgiri Hills which she visited in the summer following the Hardwar Kumbhamela in the spring of 1938. The play's plot is influenced by a simple story of an old village woman, a representative of 'dumb millions', which had appeared in the Harijan. Among the critics who wrote highly of the poetic style of this play was T.S. Eliot.

Bharati has also written some poems which have appeared in The Atlantic and Poetry (Chicago).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S. Mokashi Punekar, 'The Plays of Bharati Sarabhai' in Perspectives on Indian Drama in English, ed. M.K. Naik and S. Mokashi-Punekar (Madras, 1977).

R.M.V.R.

SARADA (Malayalam). This unfinished novel, named after its heroine, is the second of the two works of the same literary genre written by O. Chandu Menon (1847-99). It (Part I) was published in 1904, with an introduction by Kerala Varma Valiya Koil Tampuran. While the first, Indulekha, was aimed at the eradication of some anachronistic social customs, Sarada was intended to usher in an era free from litigious obsession. The former presents a world inhabited mainly by upright people while in the latter we see epitomes of crookedness and dishonesty as well. And it was Sarada with its deeper view of humour and satire and better plot structure that established Chandu Menon's fame as one of the foremost novelists in Malayalam once and for all.

From the very first chapter one can guess that Sarada is concerned with litigation and this impression gathers strength in the succeeding chapters, until it is confirmed in the last and eleventh one, in which one of the characters serves a legal notice on another.

The numerous characters in the novel are well-differentiated from one another, even more so than those in the earlier one. The reader can hardly forget the steward Kantan Menon, the serpent-eyed Varathi Pattar or the virtuous Sankara Warrier. So are the comic scenes in the lawyers' library. Another notable feature is that the author has relentlessly ridiculed self-styled lawyers, hypocritical astrologers and unabashed meddlers.

The crowd of characters representing virtues and vices and the clashes among them seem to indicate that the author had meant to reward goodness and punish wickedness. Similarly most critics agree that one Krishna Menon is the character whom the novelist had in mind as the heroine's groom. Nevertheless, none of the six who have attempted to complete the novel by writing the second part seem to have convincingly succeeded in their endeavour.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: P.K. Balakrishnan, Chandu Menon—oru pathanam; T.M. Chumar, Bhasha gadya sahitya charitram; Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer, Kerala sahitya charitram, Vol. V.

K.S.N.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

SARADAMANGAL (Bengali) is a poem by Beharilal Chakraborty (1835-1894) who came of a priestly family of Calcutta. Well-versed in medieval and modern Bengali literature, Beharilal, by nature, was a poet whose first collection of poems Sangit satak (1862) came out 'still-born from the press'. This work was received with great eagerness by a few poets and thinkers, of whom Dwijendranath Tagore, the philosopher and poet and the eldest brother of Rabindranath, was foremost. After a few years came his Saradamangal (1879) and later as a sequel to it, Sadher asan (1889).

Considered the father of modern Bengali lyric, Beharilal was accepted by many eminent poets of whom Rabindranath later proved to be the most illustrious. In the 19th century Bengal a new world of ideas arose out of western and eastern thought-currents and made their appearance in Bengali literature. From the west came the modern romantic trend of English poetry which was readily accepted by those who wrote during those days either in English or in Bengali. Beharilal, essentially a product of the Indian tradition, mingled in his poems the essence of both. From the earliest tradition of the Vedic poems (Usha and Sarasvati), Upanishads, Valmiki, Kalidasa, Bhavabhuti, and from traditional Vaishnav poems, mangal kavyas (as Saradamangal, the title, indicates), kavi songs, shakta songs, love songs, baul songs he inherited a rich treasure of literature, and with them also came the romantic impact of Byron, Wordsworth and Shelley. Basing his imagination on the traditional Tantric Chandi kavya and shastras (especially the Markandeya purana), he built his Saradamangal centring on the Goddess of knowledge (Sarasvati), who is essentially a heroine and mother goddess combined, the source of all beauty and knowledge manifested in the universe. With a cosmic imagination, Beharilal revealed in this great poem his insight into nature, love and spirituality. Like a many-splendoured dome, his Sarasvati is sometimes the universal Mother, sometimes the deity in nature, sometimes the universal woman. She is, in fact, linked with his deepest devotion to or love of the primal source of creation. The poet remains the hero throughout the poem, playing with her in communion and separation, until it ends in a universal revelation of Sarasvati. The essence of Saradamangal is intensly personal, and it indicates the transition from traditional literature to the world of individualistic modern literature. In language and form this long poem or song is the fullest expression of Beharilal's genius as a romantic and mystic poet.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bhabatosh Dutta, Kavi Beharilal Chakraborti, Bipin Bihari Gupta, Puratan prasanga; Bishnupada Panda, Bangla gitikabitar dhara; Brajendranath Bandyopadhyaya, Beharilal Chakraborti (Sahitya Sadhak Charita Mala); Mohitlal Mazumder, Bangla sahitye navayug; Rabindranath Tagore, Adhunik sahitya; Sasibhusan Dasgupta, Kabya bani; Srikumar Bandopadhyaya, Bangla sahitye bikasher dhara; Thakurdas Mukhopadhyay, Adhunik Bangla sahitya.

Pra. G.

SARAHA (Apabhramsha; 9th c.) or Sarashapada was a Vajrayani Siddha in the great tradition of eighty-four Siddhas. Mahamahopadhyaya Haraprasad Shastri refers to several synonyms of Sarahapa, viz. Saroruhavajra, Sarojavajra, Padma, Padmavajra and Rahulabhadra. From amongst them, Saroruha and Sarojavajra are mentioned in the commentary of Saraha's dohas by Advyavjra. Sarhapada was famous as an author of dohas and charyapadas as well as the first Siddhacharya. His father is said to have been a Brahmin and his mother a Dakini. He was born in the Rajnyi city of eastern India. According to a Tibetan tradition, his birth-place is in Orissa. He is supposed to have been a great scholar of the Vedas since his childhood. He went to Madhyadesha and studied the Tipitakas there, embraced Buddhism and became an Acharya at Nalanda. At that time king Chandanpala ruled over eastern India.

Sarahapada was a profound Tantrika. He visited Maharashtra and performed mahamudra-yoga in association with a girl of low caste. It is said that king Ratnapala attended the performance. In response to the king's query, Sarahapada declared that he was a Brahmin but above good and evil and considerations of castes and creeds. The public condemned him but when he recited his dohas, the king is said to have become his disciple along with his five lakh followers. He is believed to have written twenty-one books, out of which sixteen were translated from Apabhramsha into Tibetan. Besides, two works in Sanskrit are also ascribed to him. All his works are available in manuscripts at Tanjore.

D.S.

SARANGI, UDAYANATH (Oriya; b, 1905), was born in a poor family at village Sippi in Cuttack district. A seasoned journalist and literary figure, he contributed to different genres of Oriya literature, his most remarkable achievements being in the field of translation and children's literature. He associated himself with the non-cooperation movement right from his student career in his village school. Since then he had been considerably impressed by the ideals of Gandhiji. He completed his school education under the guidance of eminent teachers like Pandit Gopabandhu Das and Pandit Nilakantha Das. He went to jail for some time when he was the chief editor of the Samaja during the Quit India movement of 1942.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Well versed in English, Oriya, Hindi and Bengali, he did pioneering work in the field of translation by his much acclaimed rendering of the world famous novel Uncle Tom's Cabin into Oriya. He is also known for his short stories which embody deep concern and sympathy for the common man. He has the unique style of writing in the spoken language of common village folk.

His efforts in the field of children's literature is significant. He has written about seventy books for children which include poems, stories, biographies, and stories of birds and animals. He has also written satires following in the foot steps of Fakir Mohan and Gopalchandra Praharaj. His autobiography is a record of the freedom movement in Orissa.

He has received several awards such as the award from the Council of Children's Literature for Kutukutu, the Vishnub Award (1961), and the Orissa Sahitya Academy Award (1968). He had the honour of presiding over the children's literature section of the All India Bengali Writers Conference held at Cuttack in 1964. He has also received cash awards from the government for his contribution to children's literature for such works as Tuku mushi, Bichitra manaba, Anya graha upagraha, Kulura muluka bula, Harabhainka ghara bahuda, and Badudi mahasabha. He was also elected president of the oldest literary organisation, Utkala Sahitya Samaja, in 1981.

Among his other significant works are: short-story collections: Uneisha teialish (1944), Dampatya kalahe chaiba (1945), Mudagar moha (1948); and his autobiography, Gandhi maharajanka sisya (1980).

— P.P.

SARANGTHEM BORAMANI SINGH (Manipuri), born in 1928 at Chinga Makha Chanam Pukhri Mapal, Imphal, was a leading dramatist of Manipur. He passed the Intermediate Arts examination of Gauhati University in 1951 and joined government service from which he retired voluntarily. He is a dramatist who takes great interest in folk and legendary themes. Haorang leisang saphabi, based on a folk theme of Manipur, was written in 1950, and won the best play award in the folk category at the National Drama Festival (New Delhi) in 1954. It won several other regional awards also, and a film was made on the same story. Tonu Laijing Lembi, another folk play, was composed in 1957 based on the folk story of Moirang. Kege Lamja (The orphan of Kege), written in 1958, is also based on the folk story of Moirang. Lamitlon (Tales on place names), written in 1954, is a book on the naming of places and the cultural and historical ancedotes connected with them. Melei Leisana Nungjumpan Kadamba Leinungshi, a book of poems, was published in 1964. Mani pareng (Garland of jewels) written in 1964 is a collection of the folk-tales of Manipur. Angangi paotak wari (Useful tales for children), written in 1964, is a collection of legends and folk-tales for children. Shanulembi, a folk-play, was written in 1966, which was followed by Ching tamgi phunga wari (Folk-tales of hills and plains), a collection of folk-tales of the different groups of people of Manipur in 1975. Moirang sayon (Incarnations in Moirang), a collection of the legends of the different incarnations supposed to have taken place at Moirang, was published in 1977. In the folkplays, he uses a language which is not modern, and this helps in building up the folk atmosphere in the plays.

I.R.B.S.

SARASVATI, HEM (Assamese; 13th c.), the first poet so far known to write on the Vishnu worship in Assamese, was a contemporary of king Durlabhnarayan who ruled over Kamata kingdom in the late thirteenth century.

His Prahladcharit is a verified account of the triumph of Prahlad, the ideal and unswerving devotee of Vishnu against his anti-Vishnu father, the demoniac Hiranya Kasipu, who employed many inhuman devices to kill his son. He had acquired great powers through a boon received from the creator after long years of penance and ultimately became a menace to men and gods. The very boon became his ruin. Hem Sarasvati's great successor Sankardev also wrote a book of verse on the same subject, but the critical favour falls for the successor in point of metrical variety, dignity of expression and devotional fervour. Sankardev faithfully recreates in Assamese verse all the details as given in Bhagavatpuran in which Vaishnavism in Assam is rooted. Hem Sarasvati claims that his original was Vamanapuran, but none of the versions extant of this Purana contains this story of devotion. Hem Sarasvati introduces Dushta Sarasvati into his account; the goddess of mischievous deeds happens to have descended from the Vedic lore. Hara Gauri samvad, another poem attributed to Hem Sarasvati, begins by relating briefly the fall of the demon Hiranya Kasipu and then narrates the nuptial of Shiva and Parvati. There is, however, no link between the two stories, and the Shiva-Parvati theme was most probably revised from the Matsyapuran which had earlier supplied Kalidasa also with materials for his famous poem. Hem Sarasvati's work wants the polish and dignity noticeable in the later Vaishnava poetry which was largely influenced by Sanskrit. He, however, remains at the head of the popular tradition of Assamese poetry.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hemchandra Goswami, Milan (Gauhati, 1923): Kaliram Medhi (ed.), Prahlad charit (1914).

Jaj.S.

SARASWAT, RAWAT (Rajasthani; b. 1919, d.1989) was born at Churu and studied at a local school till he was eighteen. In search of new realms of experience he came to Bikaner where his genius slowly began to unfold itself. In the company of scholars at the Anup Sanskrit Library he learnt a good deal about the classics, and developed a fine sense of literary discernment. He grew into one of the highly esteemed writers of Rajasthan. He was a poet, critic, editor, historian, translator, and above all a guru to several inquisitive minds engaged in learning. Right from the start of his literary career in 1941, he had been exploring various facets of the culture, history, and literature of Rajasthan. Hardly is there any area of Rajasthani literature, ancient or modern, which he has not touched in his writings.

Saraswat has written in Rajasthani, English and Hindi with commendable ease and confidence. He has edited some old Rajathani texts, such as Mahadeo Parvati ri veli, Dalpat vilas, Dingal geet, Chandayan. Besides, he has edited a few modern anthologies of poetry and fiction. His well-known anthologies are Aaj ra kavi, Aaj ri Rajasthani kahaniyan, Aaj ri kavitayen, Aaj ra kahanikar, Prachin Rajasthani kavi, Dingal geet, Prabandh parijat, Lakhan, Jankavi Ustad, Rajasthani sahityakar parichaya kosh (I & II), Rajasthan ke kavi (II).

His original works in the field of research and history are: Mina itihas, Durasa Adha, Prithviraj Rathod, Identity of Rawals, Contribution of Rajasthani Writers towards Indian National Freedom and Maharaja Jaswant Singh. Also, he has translated Jafarnamo, a historical letter written to Aurangzeb by Guru Govind Singh, and Bansari of Tagore into Rajasthani. He was the founder-editor of Maruvani (1953), a journal through which he revived interest in the language and literature of Rajasthan and helped prepare a new generation of writers and scholars.

I.K.S.

SARASWATI AMMA, K. (Malayalam; b. 1919, d. 1975) was a prominent short story writer who effectively gave vent to the feelings and aspirations of women. She was born at Kunnappuzha in Trivandrum as the daughter of Padmanabha Pillai and Kartyayani Amma and was educated in the various schools there. Later she took her Bachelor's degree. For a short period she worked as a teacher and then served the Local Fund Audit Department of the state till her retirement.

Her first book Premabhajanam (1944) is a novelette. She has also written a drama called Devaduti (An angel). Her other books are mainly collections of short stories published from time to time. Born in a typical orthodox Nair family of Kerala, she was nurtured in a social set up that gave little freedom to women. Her stories give an insight into the workings of the mind of the educated women of her time and the vexations they face in the conditions prevailing then. The plight of working women and the chauvinistic attitude of man who seeks to control their fortunes are painted in deep colours. She had a personal knowledge of the pressures to which her colleagues were subjected. Man's domination over women made her indignant and prompted her to raise her voice in protest. This feature has won for her an important place among the short story writers of her period.

Most of her stories bear the stamp of her hatred towards men. Her collections like Kizhjivanakkari (A lady subordinate), Premaparikshanam (Test of love), Strijanmam (Life of women), Kanatha mathil (A thick wall), Pen buddhi (Wit of women) and Vivahasammanam (Gift for marriage) bear ample testimony to her critical, and to a certain extent, biased attitude to men. Her favourite theme was that of the emancipation of women from the tyranny of man.

N.P.U.

SARASWATI DEVI, ILLINDALA (Telugu; b. 1918) is a litterateur and renowned social worker. She started the Andhra Yuvati Mandali, a women's educational and social organization in 1936, and acted as a member of the Film Award Committee (both Central and State). She was a nominated member of the State Legislative Council (1958-66). In appreciation of her services to literature she was honoured in 1964 with the Grihalakshmi Sanstha Gold Bangle Award. The Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi too honoured her with the best woman writer award in 1974. Her collection of short stories, entitled Swarnakamalalu, received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1982.

Saraswati Devi has more than forty titles to her credit, covering the fields of essay, biography, drama, novel and story. Her works are known for their chaste and lively language. She handled literature as a powerful weapon to uphold ethical and cultural values. Swarnakamalalu is significant for its depiction of the multiplicity of human experience, insight into personal relationships, progressive outlook and engrossing style.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

P.S.M.

SARASWATICHANDRA (Gujarati), a novel in four parts by Govardhanram Tripathi, appeared between 1887 and 1901—a period of fifteen years. The publication of the first part in 1887 was something of an event in a language in which prose had yet to develop. This work with its rich variety of prose cadences set a standard which the later writers tried to achieve with only varying degrees of success. Among its many thematic strands is a concern, a quest, for the 'Indianness' of our cultural heritage as shaped by history in the criss-cross of different ideologies. The novelist's vision of life as embodied here is a blend of Hindu spiritualism, western intellectualism, and an all-embracing concept of duty. As a creator, Govardhanram has filled his vast canvas of some 2500 pages with a living world of characters.

Structurally, the first part of Saraswatichandra is about the administration of Buddhidhan, the second about Gunasundari's family life, the third about the politics in Ratnanagari, and the fourth about the consciousness of Saraswatichandra, the hero. All social, political and religious reflections are, in the main, concentrated in the last part.

The novel begins with the hero's arrival in Suvarnapur and his meeting with Kumud, wife of Pramadadhan who is the son of Buddhidhan (Diwan of Suvarnapur). Hence we have at the beginning of the novel an account of politics and intrigues in Suvarnapur under the administration of Buddhidhan. At the end of the first part of the novel Kumud leaves Suvarnapur to visit her parents. The second part of the novel thus introduces us to her family. As Kumud's father is a Diwan in the state of Ratnanagari, the third part is about that state. The last part ties up the different strands of the novel, and Kumud, supposed to have been lost, is reunited with Saraswatichandra in the monastery of Vishnudas.

Basically a love story, Govardhanram is concerned with depicting the process of refinement of the feelings of lovers. They must experience life in all its broad spectrum and be ultimately freed from desire. They must also have a glimpse of the destiny of the nation; the 'Kalyangram' project - a welfare township in part IV - serves that thematic purpose. One can see how Govardhanram combines his ideal of reuniciation with the concept of action. The love for the beloved is transformed into love for humanity. The process of the refinement of love and the quest for Indianness run parallel.

The size of Saraswatichandra has always raised questions about the form-content relationship. Anandshankar Dhruva, for instance, describes the novel as a 'purana'; Vishwanath Bhatt calls it an 'epic in prose'; and Dolarrai Mankad, following the Sanskrit critics, regards it as 'Sakalakatha'. Ramanarayan Pathak, commenting on the form and structure of Saraswatichandra, observes that the looseness of the novel does not detract from its aesthetic beauty. The novel is a mighty river in which many channels get commingled—the stories of Buddhidhan, Gunasundari, Ratnanagari, Sundargiri are all subsumed in its flow. For Umashankar, the novel is 'the poem of the Age' written in prose.

It is quite likely that Govardhanram had seen Goethe's Wilhelm Meister. Carlyle, in a preface to that novel, quoted Schlegel: 'To judge of this book, new and peculiar as it is—and only to be understood and learned from iiself—by our common notion of the novel, a notion pieced together and produced out of custom and belief - is as if a child should gaze at the moon and stars, and insist on packing them into his toy-box. Unhappily, most of us have boxes, and some of them are very small!'

It is quite natural that an epic novel like Saraswatichandra should be written around a large number of characters and incidents and that many of them should reflect contemporary life and even recall some real incidents and real men and women. There were, perhaps, living models for the characters of Buddhidhan (Diwan Shamaldas of Bhavnagar), Vishnudas (Santaram Maharaj of Nadiad), Gunasundari (the author's wife, Lalitagauri), and Alakakishori (Shamaladas's daughter, Anupkunvarba). It is also believed that the character of the hero is a self-portrait. In one of the notes in 1893 (Scrapbooks), Govardhanram himself shows his indebtedness to his models—uncle, father, mother, wife, etc.—but he has the integrity of a creative artist and points out that the characters in a novel go beyond the contours and profiles of the 'living models'; they acquire a certain creative originality. A work of art is never the sum total of incorporated qualities: the writer's imagination blends and shapes the different elements in order to make a character impersonal and pulsating with a life of his own.

The characters in Saraswatichandra are individuals, not types, though the naming of them is somewhat in the old tradition. Such names as Dushtaray, Shatharay, Buddhidhana, etc. are evocative of virtues and vices, but they are not wholly built around them. The characters of Saraswatichandra, Kumud, Kusum, Gunasundari, Chandrakant, Tarangshankar and many other have a living reality. The canvas is vast as in the Mahabharata and the Ramayana. The novelist draws his characters from all walks of life, from the highest to the lowest and peoples the world of Saraswatichandra with kings, ministers, British officers, Indian officials, sadhus, journalists, clerks, businessmen, dacoits, patriots and anglophiles. He portrays the society not only as he sees it, but as it should ideally be.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Critics never tire of discussing the ending of Saraswatichandra, which raises three points: (1) Why was Kumud not married to Saraswatichandra? (2) Why should Kusum offer to marry Saraswatichandra? (3) Even if Kusum offered to marry Saraswatichandra, why should he be willing to marry her when he was in love with Kumud? To these questions it would be too simplistic to offer a ready-made answer. As for Kumud, it can perhaps be said that her inner development does not point towards marriage. She has transcended desire and attained a kind of 'divinity of tears'.

The ending of a great work of art is the natural outcome of the portrayal of characters and incidents and the tone adopted by the writer. There is enough internal evidence, especially in the last part of the novel, to rule out Kumud's marriage. Govardhanram did not regard marriage as the fulfilment of life or as indispensable for the realisation of the potential of life, but he admits the role of love in achieving this potential. And he believed in the refinement of love, in purging it of the dross of desire. The ending of Saraswatichandra thus emphasises a continual process of refinement and progressive renunciation centred round the ideal of duty.

The conflict in the characters is both internal and external, but the conflict with the prevalent customs and dogmas of the Hindu society provides an additional dimension. The characters do not show typical Hindu reactions. The characters of Buddhidhan and Vidyachatur, in particular, transcend the narrow bounds of Hinduism, and Saraswatichandra himself represents some elements in the character of Hamlet. And the women characters in the novel are, in the main, drawn with great sensitivity. The minor characters, too, have a life and individuality of their own.

The criticism that reflective passages in the novel impede the flow of the narrative is too sweeping a generalisation. Govardhanram is a conscious artist, and reflection in Saraswatichandra is one of the major thematic concerns. Moreover, reflection is seldom presented as an unassimilated chunk in the narrative. There is usually some context, some occasion in a given situation, that calls for reflection.

Govardhanram's treatment of the problems of the Indian family is especially noteworthy. While his characters are not types, the families are typical and realistically depicted. The author's aim seems to focus our attention on the problem of harmony in a Hindu family. In fact, his treatment of home, family, state and religion is in terms of the process of evolution. He puts forth his conception of 'lakshya' (perceptible) and 'alakshya' (imperceptible), and judges the issues as they arise in life. The synthesis is meant to harmonize his ideals of duty and practical asceticism.

About Govindram's narrative powers, there can be no doubt: the very first chapter of Saraswatichandra is a tour de force. The novelist combines a figurative style with narrative simplicity, alternating long-drawn periods with brief, telling statements. One could, perhaps, see the influence of Bana and Burke on his style. He has a fine ear for the rhythm of prose, and a variety of prose cadences that are possible have been effectively used. The diction is a happy blend of Sanskrit words, and words borrowed from English; when grafted on the staple form of spoken Gujarati, this blend makes for an enchanting fabric. And interwoven in this fabric, we have original poems as well as some translated ones—a factor that may have contributed to the novel's popularity.

In spite of Govardhanram's preoccupation with the contemporary problems of petty princely states (which he predicted would be merged with the Indian Union one day), the British rule (for which he had great admiration), the pressures on the social system brought on by contact with the west, and the changes taking place in the Hindu family system, it would be a mistake to think of Saraswatichandra as merely a period novel. The contemporary issues are assimilated in larger ideological patterns which have a permanent human value. The central issue in the novel is essentially human love and its evolution, love that ultimately transcends despair and tragic consciousness and ends in a calm of mind that passes understanding.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ramanlal Joshi, Govardhanram — ek adhyayan (Bombay, 2nd ed., 1978); Govardhanram (New Delhi, 1979); Rasiklal C. Parikh, Saraswatichandra no mahima eni patrasristiman (Ahmedabad, 1976).

Ra.J.

'SARATHI', O.P. SHARMA (Dogri; b.1933), a prolific writer, was born at the village Amb near Jammu. He started his career as an artist and held two one-man exhibitions of his paintings in 1962 and 1964. His literary career started with the publication of his lyrics, short stories and novels in the late sixties. His first collection of short stories in Hindi was published in 1965 under the title Umren, which was followed by another collection in

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Urdu, entitled Lakeeren. But it was his collection of short stories in Dogri, entitled Sukka barood (1971), which brought him into the limelight. This was followed by another collection, Lok gai lok (1971). His short stories portray the tensions of modern life in the cities and the resultant complex situations faced by the 'man of today'. His stories and novels also dilate upon the erosion of moral values caused by the onslaughts of modern life and its pulls in opposite directions.

'Sarathi's other works include: Poetry: Tandan (The threads, 1971), Partan (1974); Novels: Treh samunder di (Thirst of the sea, 1978), a romantic novel, Nanga Rukh (Naked tree, 1978), a non-conventional novelette awarded by Sahitya Akademi in 1979, (this was translated into Hindi by Ashok Jerath with the same title and into English by Shivanath titled as Churning of the city), Makaan (The house, 1979), Resham de keede (The silkworms, 1979), Pathar te rang (The stones and the shades, 1981).

As.J

SARDAR, GANGADHAR BALKRISHNA (Marathi; b.1908) did his M.A from Bombay University in 1934. He remained unemployed up to 1940, and studied the works of Marathi saint-poets, Mahatma Gandhi and Karl Marx extensively.

He joined the S.N.D.T. College for Women at Pune in 1941 as Lecturer in Marathi. He retired in 1968 as Head of the Marathi Department of the S.N.D.T Women's University. The G.B. Sardar Felicitation Volume, edited by B.S. Bhange, was published in 1968. Sardar is known as a distinguished orator, an authority on saint-poets, and a social thinker of high order. His books were well received by the critics. They are Arvacheen gadyachi purva-peethika 1800 to 1874, Maharastrache upekshit mankari, Santavangamayachi samajik phalashruti (translated into English by Kumud Mehta as Saint poets of Maharashtra: Their Impact on Society, 1969), Sant-sahityachi samajik and rajkeeya kamgiri (Lad Memorial Lecture, pub. 1965), Jnaneshwaranchi jeevan nishtha (1971), Nyayamurti Ranade-pranit samajik sudharanechi tatva mimansa (1973), Agarkarancha samajik tatvavichar and Mahatma Phule: vichar and karya (1981). His select articles are edited by Nirmalkumar Phadkule as Pra-bodhanatil paul-khuna (1978) and Dharma ani samaj parivartan (1982). Sardar has also the following edited works to his credit: Maharashtra jeevan: parampara, pragati ani samasya, Vols. I and II (1960), Sankraman kalache avhan (1966), Tukaram darshan (1968), Ramdas darshan (1972) and Eknath darshan (1978).

About sixty articles written by him on social and literary problems were published from 1930 to 1980 in various periodicals.

In 1978, he chaired the Dalit Sahitya Sammelan, held in Bombay, and was elected President of the 54th session of the All India Marathi Literary conference, held at Barsi in 1980.

Sardar sincerely believed in the social commitment of the writer, and firmly held that literature, though the product of an individual, achieves greatness by its impact on society. He felt that literature should try to do away with the dominance of tradition and the hierarchy in castes and creeds. It should help to foster in people a sense of social commitment. He lent full support to the movement of 'Dalit Sahitya', the literature of the downtrodden.

H.V.I.

SARDESSAI, LAKSHMANARAO (Marathi/Konkani; b.1904), a short story writer and essayist, was born at Savoi-veram, Goa. He started writing in Marathi in 1922 for the weekly Bharat under the pen-name 'Soumitra' and contributed regularly in Portuguese and Marathi to Hindu, O Heraldo, Prakash, Kesari, etc. He founded Collegio Indiano in Mapusa (Goa) in 1927 and was Director of Collegio Almeida, Ponda (1930-40). From 1929, he started writing short stories for Marathi magazines like Yashvant and Ratnakar and won a prize in a contest organised by Yashvant in 1930 for his story 'Mohini'. He published his first collection of short stories in Marathi, entitled Kalpavrikshachya chhayent (Under the coconut tree, 1934). The book was acclaimed as a significant contribution to Marathi literature, and its author came to be known as a pioneer of regional literature in Marathi. The stories have for their backdrop the charming landscape of Goa with its coconut, areca and mango groves, temples and churches, golden beaches and limpid rivers, and throw vivid light on the life of the Goans, both Hindus and Christians, with their zest for life and love of beauty.

The same traits may be discerned in the collections that followed: Sagarachya lata (Waves of the sea). Vadllantli nauka (The ship in the tempest), Dhasallele buruz (Ramparts in ruins), Aniteche divya (Anita's ordeal), Sounsarantil amrit (The nectar of family life), Soneri un (Golden sunshine) and Nivara (Shelter). His only novel in Marathi, Mandavi tu atlis (Mandavi, you are dried up) poignantly depicts the degradation of the Goans under the Portuguese regime, and expresses his sorrow at their plight, hinting at an end to their suffering through Hindu-Christian unity. He participated in the Liberation Movement of Goa and was one of the founders of

Domain, Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

National Congress, Goa. He offered Satyagraha (1946) and suffered imprisonment for a month, and in 1947 again for one year. In 1949, he settled down in Bombay and wrote extensively for Marathi magazines and also for the Radio. His short stories underwent a change, ceasing to be regional and covered a wider variety of themes and expressed newer moods. He obtained the first prize for his Marathi story 'Mohar' (Gold coin) in the short-story competition organized by the New York Herald Tribune (1951).

In 1959, Sardessai went to Delhi where he worked as Chief of the Konkani-Portuguese Unit (External services) of AIR, until 1963. He was the recipient of the Gold Medal instituted by Gomantak Sahitya Sammelan (1966). In 1977, he presided over the 15th Gomantak Marathi Literary Conference. He has translated into Marathi several Portuguese and French short stories. Jagavegala, his translation of Albert Camus' L'Etranger, received the Maharashtra Government Award. He also translated Francisco Luis Gomes' Portuguese novel Os Bharhamannas as Brahmann (1977). Though famous mostly for his regional short stories, his story-telling has undergone further metamorphosis since 1934. His recent stories such as 'Lal kanta' (The red needle) and 'Pazhar' (Outburst of feelings) show greater concern for fundamental problems of life and display an introspective mood and are frankly autobiographical. Influenced by Maupassant, he displays a sureness of technique and a sense of concision. His descriptions of nature are neither too florid nor too elaborate; his portraits are intensely life-like and hardly overcharged. Though his stories have a telling unity of effect, he rarely aims at surprising the reader. He can also retell an old legend with great success as seen in short stories like 'Saffa Masjid' 'Devichi murti' (Image of goddess) and 'Gharannyachi talvar' (The family sword).

Though he started writing in Konkani only since 1950, his contribution is quite significant—a number of essays, articles, playlets and poems. He is inimitable in portraits of Goan types like 'Render' (Toddy tapper); 'Poder' (Baker) and 'Bhagat' (Village temple-priest). He uses a language which is delightfully idiomatic and revives the old world flavour of the people and things he describes. He has also tried his hand at criticism and published a pioneering work in Kathashilpa (The craft of short story, 1977). During the International Year for Children (1979) he published Ramgyali Vaghabhoundi (Ramgo's tiger hunt) and Papdam kavllyo (Bunches of pappad) for children. His Khabri kaim karmanchyo, kaim varmanchyo (About myself, my deeds, my desires) won the Sahitya Akademi Award (1982).

D.K.S.

SARDESSAI, MANOHARRAI (Konkani; b. 1925), eminent poet, essayist and critic, was born at Panjim (Goa). He did his M.A. in French and Marathi in 1949 from the University of Bombay (1949), and started his career as a lecturer in French. He contributed articles, short stories and poems in Marathi to a number of periodicals such as Abhiruchi, Manohar, Kirloskar, and Navayug, and edited a Konkani magazine Sad. He went to France in 1952 and earned his Doctorate in French on 'The Image of India in France' from Sorbonne University in 1958. On his return to India, he worked with All India Radio, Delhi. He published and staged a dance-drama in verse, 'Aiz re dholar padli badi' (The drums are beating, 1961), dealing with Kansa's death at the hands of Krishna, containing indirect references to Portuguese tyranny in Goa. Then followed Gomyam tujya mogakhatir (For the sake of your love, oh Goa, 1961), a collection of poems written mostly in France and expressing a sense of nostalgia for the home land. After Goa's liberation in 1961, he presided over the eighth Konkani Conference (Margao, 1962), and gave a new direction to the Konkani movement with his historic presidential address: 'Konkani bhas amchi mai amchi bhas amkam zai' (Konkani language is our mother and we certainly want our mother, 1962). He was President of the Konkani Bhasha Mandal, Goa (1964-67), and edited Konkani language text-books. Zayat zage (Arise, awake, 1964) is a collection of his socialistic poems. Jaya punya bhu jaya Bharata (Long live holy India, 1965) is a small volume of his patriotic songs. Bebyanche kazar (Marriage of frogs, 1965) made him extremely popular with the children. He was elected 'Prince of Poets' (Kaviraj) in 1966 and awarded the first prize for patriotic songs in Konkani by All India Radio. Ramgeeta (1968) contains lyrics on the life of Shri Rama and were successfully set to music. Zayo-zuyo (Jasmine flowers, 1970) are short poems condensed in their form and profound in their content, which won the Goa Kala Academy Prize, 1973. The book was highly acclaimed. Smuggle (1975) is a collection of three one-act plays marked by literary merit, and Pissollim (Butterflies, 1978), the winner of the Sahitya Akademi Award, is in the same mould as Zayo zuyo. They are short poems, varied in form and content. Along with the vein of melancholy, there is a satirical vein, at times bordering on cynicism. Bhangarachi kurad (The golden axe, 1979), a narrative poem, and Mankulim gitam (Tiny songs, 1982), are some of his more recent books for children. Manoharrai has been a formidable crusader and propagandist, who has worked for the recognition and development of Konkani through his poetry. He wrote innumerable pamphlets in Konkani and English to achieve that end. In the process, he wrote some memorable long satirical poems such as Hi lok shay (This democracy) and Aido poll (The opinion poll is here). The latter, with many other inspiring poems during the historic opinion poll, inspired people to vote against Goa's merger with Maharashtra. Kandid is an excellent translation of Voltaire's French classic Candide. He is basically a scholar which is evident from several prefaces he has written to books over the last twenty years. A simple language replete with powerful imagery, and a lucid style suitable to themes drawn from familiar life make Manoharrai a major poet in Konkani.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

D.K.S.

SARKAR, AKSHAYCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1846; d. 1917), editor and author, was born at Chinsura. He passed the B.A. examination in 1867 and did his B.L. in 1868. He practised law first at Behrampur and later at Chinsura. He regularly contributed to Bangadarsan edited by Bankimchandra. His article 'Uddipana' was published in the first issue (April 1872) of Bangadarsan. Bankimchandra wrote about Akshaychandra in a letter to his friend immediately before the publication of the article; I have got a lot of contributors, who have promised to write and can write. In Dinabandhu, Hemchandra, Krishnakamal Bhattacharya, Taraprasad Chatterjee and a young man whom you don't know, but whose intellectual life, I think, I have greatly influenced, for good or for evil, and whose inherent gifts presage something great for him in future. His name is Akkhay Sarkar.' Bankimchandra included two essays of Akshaychandra, 'Chandraloke' and 'Mashak' in his own Kamalakanter daptar. Akshaychandra reviewed many books and journals for Bangadarsan, and published the weekly magazine Sadharani from Chinsura in 1873. Bankimchandra, Rabindranath, Hemchandra, Nabinchandra and Akshaychandra himself wrote for this magazine. He was Vice-president of Bangiya Sahitya Parisad and Joint Deputy Secretary of Indian Association. He was the general President of the sixth Bangiya Sahitya Sammelan which was held in Chittagong. His literary works include : Sikshanabiser padya (1874), Samaj samalochana (1874), Gocharaner mat (1880). Hate hate phal (1882), Sankhipta Ramayana (1882), Alochana (1882), Sanatani (1911), Kabi Hemchandra (1912), Moti Kumari (1917), Mahapuja (1921) Rupak Orahasya (1923), Sahitya sadhana (1923).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Amitrasudan Bhattacharya, Bankimchandra Bangadarsan (Calcutta, 1971); Brajendranath Banerjee, Sahitya sadhak Charitmala, No. (4th ed., Calcutta, 1956).

Am.B.

SARKAR, BENOY KUMAR (Bengali; b. 1887, d. 1949), a renowned teacher and sociologist, was born at Malda. After passing the Entrance Examination from the Malda Zilla school he came to Calcutta for his college education. He passed his B.A. examination, standing first amongst the honours candidates, from the University of Calcutta, and secured the Eshan scholarship. But under the impact of the Swadeshi movement he boycotted the University as a protest against the Carlyle circular which had prohibited the students from chanting 'Vandemataram'. As a result of their agitation, a National Council of Education was set up, which established a national college and several national schools. Benoy Kumar, with Rabindranarayan Ghose and Radha Kumud Mukherjee, joined the Council as a teacher. He had already come under the benign influence of Professor Satis Chandra Mukherjee, a philosopher and founder of the Dawn society. As a teacher for the National Council, Benoy Kumar wrote such books as Banga nabajuger nabashiksha (1907), Siksha vijnaner bhumika (1910), Bhasa siksha (1910) and Siksha samalochana (1912).

The Swadeshi Movement gradually ebbed down. Benoy Kumar had already appeared at the M.A. examination in 1909, and in 1914 he went abroad and toured different parts of the continent. He came back to the country in 1924 and joined the University of Calcutta as a teacher. He also edited a monthly journal, Arthik jagat, for reviewing the economic problems of the country. He wrote several books in English and Bengali. Some of his well-known Bengali works are Nigrojatir karmaveer (Great men of action among the Negroes), Vartaman jagat (Modern world) in 13 volumes, Dhana doulater rupantar (Metamorphosis of wealth and property) and China sabhyatar A.A.Ka.Kha (A.B.C. of Chinese civilisation).

He also translated into Bengali the Origin of Family and Property by Frederich Engels. The titles of some of his important writings in English are: Science of History and the Hope of Mankind, Creative India, Hindu Achievement in Exact Sciences, Political Theories and Institutions of the Hindus, The Futurism of Young Asia, Sociology of Young Asia, Positive Background of Hindu Sociology, Sociology of Races, Cultures, and Human Progress, and Villages and Towns in Social Pattern.

Sarkar was estemed highly by his contemporaries for his style and thought which bore the mark of his strong personality. The message of the Swadeshi never died for him. A staunch nationalist, he was at the same time a dreamer for the Asian unity.

Sur. Mo.

Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

SARKAR, JADUNATH (Bengali; b. 1870, d. 1958), eminent historian and educationist, was born at Karachmaria in the district of Rajashahi, now in Bangladesh. After a brilliant academic career he passed his M.A. examination in English (1892) from Calcutta University, securing the highest position in the first division. Later, he worked as Professor of English and History at different colleges in Calcutta. He secured the much coveted Premchand Roychand Scholarship from Calcutta University in 1898. Thereafter, he served Presidency College (Calcutta), Patna College, and Ravenshaw College (Cuttack) from 1898 to 1926, and for a short spell of two years, on deputation, as Head of the History Department, Banaras Hindu University. In 1919 he was promoted to the Indian Education Service. On retirement from government service he was appointed Vice-Chancellor of Calcutta University in 1926.

Jadunath had been a keen student of history since his boyhood. Although appointed as Professor of English in different colleges, he maintained his love of history. He mastered the Persian and Marathi languages and collected manuscripts and documents from various parts of India, visiting several places for this purpose. After years of hard labour and study he published his History of Aurangzeb (1912-24) in 5 vols. It was followed by the Fall of the Mughal Empire (1932-50) in 4 vols. He also wrote several authentic works on Shivaji—Shivaji and His Times (1919), House of Shivaji (1940), and Shivaji, a Study in Leadership (1950).

Through the above works and many others Jadunath in his lifetime came to be known widely as an authority on the history of the Mughal empire since Aurangzeb until its decline as also on the rise of the Marathas. Jadunath contributed four chapters to the Cambridge History of India (Vol. IV. 1937). He edited the History of Bengal (Muslim period), Vol.II (1942), published by the Dacca University. Jadunath translated and edited several Persian texts and documents. His other works in English include India Through the Ages (1928),Chaitanya (1913), Economics of British India (1909) and Military History of India (1960). Jadunath, a leading historian of his time, had to publish out of necessity most of his works in English. Nonetheless his love of Bengali literature appears in ample evidence in his numerous articles, about two hundred, contributed to various Bengali periodicals. He was intimately associated with the Bangiya Sahitya Parishad and served as its President for a long time.

Jadunath was variously honoured by his countrymen and the government. He was made a Companion of the Order the Indian Empire in 1926, and a Knighthood was conferred upon him in 1929.

His works in Bengali include Shivaji (Calcutta, 1929) and Maratha jatir vikas (Calcutta, 1936).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Sahitya sadhak charitmala, No. 120 (Calcutta, 1982) and Bengal Past and Present, Sir Jadunath Centenary Issue (Calcutta, 1970).

G.S.

SARKAR, JOGINDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1866, d. 1937) was born at Joynagar in 24 Paraganas, West Bengal. He matriculated from Deoghar High School, and was admitted to college in Calcutta for higher studies but had to leave them incomplete and take a teaching post at City School (1891). He wrote for children's magazines. The publication of his Hasi o khela (1891) ushered in a new trend in juvenile literature. Rabindranath Tagore hailed the book as the first Bengali text for children that combined instruction with entertainment. Afterwards he published book after book, not always his own, but collections from other talented authors also.

He gave up teaching and established his publishing firm, City Book Society (1896), which produced excellent illustrated books for children, and is still operating. Himself a talented author, he is even better known as an influential editor. He never acquired wealth and died in modest circumstances in 1937.

His works include, besides Hasi o khela: Chhabi o galpa (1891), Chhada o chhabi (1896), Ranga chhabi (1896), Hasi khushi (1897), Khelar sathi (1898), Khukumonir chhada (1899), Khelar gan (1899), Pashu pakhi (1911), Hasirashi (1921), Hijibiji (1927), Majar galpa (1921), Chhada o pada (1921), Chhotoder Ramayana (1925), Chhotoder Mahabharata (1926), Janoarer kanda (1927), and Bone jangale (1928).

These are stories, folk-tales, nursery rhymes, jungle tales, etc. of great interest to children.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Khagendranath Mitra, Shatabdir shishu sahitya (1958); Lila Majumdar, Jogindranath Sarkar (1967); Alor phulki, (1980); Bharat kosh, Vol. 5 (Bangiya Sahitya Parishad); Sahitya sadhak charitmala, Vol. 10 (Bangiya Sahitya Parishad).

L.M.

SARKAR, NARAHARI (Bengali; 16th c.) was a Vaishnava leader of the sixteenth century. He came from Srikhanda, now in the district of Burdwan, West Bengal. His father Narayandasa and elder brother, Mukunda, were physicians by profession and served under sultans Ruknuddin Barbak Shah, (1459-76) and Alauddin Husain Shah (1493-1519) respectively. Narahari, Mukunda and

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Raghunandana (Mukund's son) were close associates of Chaitanya. Narahari propagated a doctrine of Vaishnavism, which differs to a great extent from the doctrines preached by others. The doctrine of Narahari is known as Gaurangavad. According to it, Chaitanya behaved exactly like Krishna in all respects. Even the role of Nagara (lover) was not spared by him. Lochan Das, the writer of Chaitanyamangala, was Narahari's disciple and followed the doctrine of Gauranagavada in his book. It is written in Ramagopal Das's Shakhanirnay, a work of the seventeenth century, that Lochan was so much devoted to his preceptor that oncse, to clear the debts of Narahari, he sold himself to the Portuguese and collected the necessary fees.

Narahari Sarkar was a first rate writer of Vaishnava padas. It is said that he at first wrote on Krishna but, after the advent of Chaitanya, began to write only on the latter. A few lines from one of his padas are quoted below:

Gauranga thekila pake,
Bhaver abeshe Radha Radha beli dake
Suradhurni dekhi pahu yamunar bhane,
Phulaban dekhi Vrindavan pada mane.

Unfortunately, most of the padas of Narahari Sarkar have got mixed up with those written by Narahari Chakravarti, a poet of the eighteenth century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Asit Kumar Bandyopadhyay, Bangla sahityer itivritta (Vol. II); Bimanbehari Majumdar, Shodash shatabdir padavali sahitya (1961); Sukumar Sen, Bangla sahityer itihas, (Vol. I)

Su.M.

SARKAR, PRAFULLA KUMAR (Bengali; b. 1884, d. 1944), eminent journalist and founder editor of the influential Bengali daily Ananda bazar patrika, was born in a middle-class family at Kumarkhali, near Kustia, now in Bangladesh. He passed the Entrance examination from Pabna Zilla School in 1901 and graduated from the University of Calcutta in 1905. He was awarded the 'Bankim Medal' for securing the highest marks in Bengali. He passed the Bachelor of Law examination in 1908.

Nationalist Prafulla Kumar could not keep himself away from the Banga-bhanga Andolan (the movement to resist the partition of Bengal), which brought him close to Satishchandra Mukherjee, one of the pioneers of the Movement, the founder of the Dawn Society, and an architect of the National Council of Education, Bengal.

In 1908, Prafulla Kumar joined the Bar at Faridpur and a year later, the Bar at Daltonganj, Bihar. He left the job and served the Dhenkanal State in Orissa successively as resident tutor to the royal family, as Assistant Dewan and finally as Dewan. In December 1921 he returned to Calcutta and joined the Amrita bazar patrika as Assistant Editor but served only for a few months. He was to take over shortly as the founder editor of the new daily Ananda bazar patrika on 13 March 1922.

On 9 September 1922, Sarkar published in the Patrika a life-sketch and an editorial on Jatindranath Mukherjee, an illustrious revolutionary, popularly known as Bagha Jatin. As a result, he was arrested and had to remain in prison for two months as an under-trial prisoner. He took over the editorship of the Patrika again in 1941 when his friend and colleague Satyendranath Majumdar retired as its editor, and continued until his death in 1944.

Sarkar's contribution to Bengali literature is quite substantial. His writings appeared first in the Bhandar, a Bengali periodical edited by Rabindranath Tagore. He was a regular contributor to Bangadarshan, Sahitya and Narayan which were edited by Tagore, Sureshchandra Samajpati and Deshbandhu Chittaranjan Das.

His novels include Anagata (1928), Balir bandh (1934), Lokaranya, Bhrasta-lagna (1951) and Bidyut lekha. He wrote a biography of Sri Gauranga (1933) and translated into Bengali the Autobiography of Sir P.C. Ray. His anxiety about the future of the nation and his keen interest in the socio-cultural life of the people have been nicely expressed in his Kshayishnu Hindu and Jatiya andolane Rabindranath (1945).

Prafulla Kumar was associated with a number of literary and cultural organisations in Bengal. He was elected President of the Indian Jounalists' Association in 1942. He was greatly influenced by the Bengali renaissance of the 19th century whose values he cherished in life and which he tried to keep up for the future generations.

Tu.M.

SARMA, ARUN (Assamese; b. 1933), playwright and actor, was born in the village of Halem, district Darrang. Having passed the Matriculation examination from the local Secondary school, he graduated from Cotton College, Gauhati. His father Tilak Chandra Sarma encouraged the budding dramatist in his intial attempts at the dramatic art. After graduation he served for two years as a teacher in a Secondary school after which he was inducted into the Gauhati centre of the All India Radio.

Sarma has so far published seven plays, viz. Jinti (1962), Urukha paja (Leaking cottage, (1964), Purusa

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

(The menfolk, 1964), Nibaran Bhattacharya (1967), Kukurnmechia manuh (The wolf man), Ahar (Food, 1978) and Buranji-path (Lessons of history, 1980). Sarma has the distinction of receiving prizes twice in the All India drama competitions. Of his first two plays written in conventional technique, the first one deals with the problems of love between a hill girl and a youth of the plain which ends in a tragic note, and the second one depicts poverty in all its nakedness. The playwright changes his conventional technique in the next play Purusa, where through the medium of a circus party he shows the man-woman relation in which the woman dominates and commands, like a ring leader in a circus, driving the man to exasperation so that he commits murder in order to free himself from the soul-killing stranglehold of the woman. Nibaran Bhattacharya portrays the tragedy and frustration of a dramatist in a society indifferent to the artist's life and his mission. Ahar adopts the technique of the Absurd drama introduced by Beckett and Ionesco, and shows the relationship of a woman with different persons as a beloved girl, a wife, a mother, and a prostitute, in different circumstances. Buranji-path deals with the rise and fall of a family in three generations. In Kukurnechia manush he dramatises the story of the wolf-boy Ramu in a different context with a different purpose. Exploitation of minorities is the main theme of the play. Sarma visited the United Kindom in 1969 to study the recent trends of drama and dramatic productions. He appears to be considerably influenced by Badal Sircar and Ionesco in his dramatic technique.

S.S.

SARMA, BENUDHAR (Assamese; b. 1994, d.1981), the doyen of the modern historians of Assam, will always be remembered for his inimitable prose and his contribution to the study of Assam's history. He was born in a lower middle class family of Charing, a place of historical importance in the district of Sibsagar. It is a place redolent with memories of many historical incidents, being the seat of the heirs apparent of the later Ahom monarchs, and these must have infused historical inquisitiveness into the young mind of Benudhar while he was a teenaged school boy. Having passed the Matriculation examination from Sibsagar, he studied up to the B.A. class in Bangabasi College, Calcutta, but in response to the call of Mahatma Gandhi for the non-cooperation movement he gave up his studies without appearing at the final B.A. examination. He participated in the two national movements of 1920-21 and 1930-31 and courted imprisonment during the former. He served on the editorial staff of Dainik Batari (Daily Batari) in the latter half of the thirties. He also worked as the editor of Tarun Asam (Thy young Assam), an Assamese weekly published in the forties from Dibrugarh. He was President of the twenty-fifth annual session of Assam Sahitya Sabha held at Dhubri in 1956.

Benudhar Sarma will be remembered for his threefold contribution: as a historian, a biographer, and a creator of children's literature. He started his literary career by translating an abridged version of Robinson Crusoe in collaboration with one of his friends and published the same in 1918. Since then, amidst the multifarious callings adopted by him from time to time, he had contributed to different genres of literature. He edited and published in 1927 J.P. Wade's An Account of Assam written in 1793-1794. He contributed to contemporary magazines a large number of historical articles which are marked by his penetrating insight and analytical approach but occasionally vitiated by his temperamental enthusism. Some of these articles were later collected into Durbin (1951) and Satawan chal (1957). Among his half-a-dozen biographies, the historical biography of Maniram Dewan, the rebellious martyr of 1857, stands out prominently as a work of sustained labour and research. His other notable biography is on the life and literary activities of Hemchandra Goswami, a pioneer litterateur of the early modern period. His Sahitya Akademi Award winning book, Congressar kachiyali ra'dat (1959) brings out in a nostalgic manner the impact of the first congress movement on the rural folks of Assam, drawing vignettes of different types of people he had come across while propagating the movement's ideals. His other important work, Dakhinpat satrar buranji (1968), is not only the history of a Vaishnavite institution, but also a repository of the cultural heritage of medieval Assam.

Sarma's name will be remembered by the literary circle for his penetrating assessment of some of the historical characters and events in the medieval history of Assam in a language which is not only forceful but also racy and highly idiomatic in expression. He has the unique power of using adages, proverbs and everyday phrases with a telling effect, and this quality of his prose enhanced the effect of his historical writings.

He was posthumously awarded 'Padmabhushan' by the President of India in 1983.

S.S.

SARMA, DINANATH (Assamese; b.1894, d.1978) was editor of the famous monthly magazine, Awahan, that created an epoch during the 30s and 40s of this century. Son of an Ayurvedic physician, Dinanath matriculated from Gauripur and then took a diploma in medicine from the National Medical College, Calcutta. Besides being a physician, he was also a political and social worker. As a political worker, he participated in the freedom movement, and as a social worker worked for the removal of caste system and the introduction of widow remarriage among the Brahmins.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

As editor of Awahan, he introduced many new writers to Assamese literature during the thirties and forties. In the field of short stories, he brought in internalized action expressed in emotive words. The magazine was also the mouthpiece of the romantic movement in Assamese literature.

In his later years Sarma was a man of progressive outlook. He wrote two prose-works Soviet biplav aru Asamiya sahitya (Soviet Revolution and Assamese literature, 1972), and Russ Bharat kahini (Indo-Soviet story, 1973), the latter in collaboration with his son, Dipak Sarma. In Soviet biplav aru Asamiya sahitya, the author discusses how the revolution in Soviet Russia influenced the Assamese writers. In the other book, the authors show how India has maintained good relations with Russia from the days of Gandhi and Tolstoy to the present times.

Sarma also translated Albert Camus' The Outsider under the title Bahira manuh, serialised in the pages of Awahan.

An.S.

SARMA, DURGESWAR (Assamese; b.1882, d.1961) was a popular lyric poet and playwright. After a brilliant academic career, he became a practising lawyer at the Jorhat Bar (1907-1911). Later, he served in various capacities as a government officer until he retired in the early forties.

Though Durgeswar was a senior officer during the British rule, he never became a so-called sahib and led a remarkably simple life, which is reflected in his poetic style too. He wrote in Jonaki and Ramdhenu, the leading Assamese journals, which brought him recognition. Two anthologies of his poems, Anjali (Offerings, 1910) and Nivedan (Appeal, 1920) appeared in his life-time, though another collection, Upasana (Prayers), came out as part of his complete works in 1978, published by the Assam Sahitya Sabha. Anjali is a volume of 78 poems, representing the emotional exuberance of the poet's early youth, while Nivedan is a collection of 85 poems reflecting a certain degree of maturity in the poet's emotional life. Upasana is a collection of 25 poems, published in various journals or found in manuscripts. Anjali includes ten sonnets also of the Shakespearean type.

Durgeswar's poems deal, in the main, with the themes of love, nature, the supernatural, and spiritual yearnings. His beautiful rendering of Wordsworth's Lucy poems into Assamese clearly testify to the impact of Wordsworth on him.

Durgeswar is also a popular playwright in Assamese. Of his four plays two are mythological, and two renderings of Shakespeare's plays. Of the two mythological plays, Partha parajoy (The defeat of Partha, 1909) is based on a theme from the Mahabharata, and Balibadh (The killing of Bali, 1912) on a theme from the Ramayana. Of his two Assamese renderings Chandravali (1910) is an adaptation of Shakespeare's As You Like It, and Padmavati that of Cymbeline. Although the themes are derived from Shakespeare, the characters are indigenous, and the verse in dialogues shows the poet's command of dramatic art. The plays once enjoyed immense popularity with the lovers of theatre.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Mahendra Bora (ed.), Durgeswar Sarma rachanavali (Jorhat, 1978).

Pu.S.

SARMA, GOPINATH NANDA (Oriya; b. 1869, d. 1924) was born at Manjusha, now in the state of Andhra Pradesh, but brought up at Paralakhemundi in the district of Ganjam. He was proficient in many languages like Sanskrit, Pali, Prakrit, Oriya, Bengali, Hindi and Telugu. He was born at a time when the Oriya speaking people were passing through a crucial period of history. The present state of Orissa was not yet formed and its language suffered from neglect. He devoted his life to the enrichment of Oriya literature. He was a poet, dramatist, critic, translator, and Sanskrit scholar. Though he did not have any formal education, the college authorities at Paralakhemundi were so impressed with his scholarship that they appointed him a teacher for Sanskrit and Oriya.

Sarma's contribution to the growth of modern Oriya literature is quite significant and he left his impress on many genres — drama, essay, poetry, criticism, lexicography, translation. He started as a poet, wrote original poems in Oriya or translated them from Sanskrit. In this context one can recall his Udhabaduta kavya, Padyavali, Piyusha dhara, Bilhaniya kavya, and Meghaduta also. His Kumar Vijay is a prose translation of Kalidasa's Kumarsambhava. His translations are accurate, trying to communicate the beauty of the original.

Gopinath has several Oriya plays to his credit. The verses in them are usually in Sanskrit metres. His tanslations of Sanskrit plays like Unmatta Raghava by

Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Bhaskar, Vikramorvasiya by Kalidasa and Janaki parinaya are quite well known. His Sita banabasa and Ramasvomedha nataka are not literal translations of Bhavabhuti's Uttararamacharita but attempts to dramatise the original story.

He was also a pioneer in compiling the first etymological Oriya dictionary. In this field he stands no comparison. It took him seven years to compile his Oriya lexicon, Sabdatattva abhidhan.

Gopinath Nanda Sarma will be long remembered for his Oriya bhasatattva. It evinces his rare merit in a comparative study of Oriya, Pali and Prakrit languages, showing the origin and gradual development of Oriya language, and its relationship with Prakrit and Sanskrit. His scholarly contribution to critical literature is also amazing. He took up for critical study the Mahabharata of Sarala Das, the Bhagabat of Jagannath Das and the Ramayana of Balarama Das, the great epics of Orissa. He compares all these books with the originals in Sanskrit and their versions in Telugu, Hindi and Bengali. Unfortunately, his studies of the Ramayana and the Bhagabat have not yet been published in book form. Apart from this comparative criticism, he wrote some essays in different periodicals of the day. He has, indeed, left the stamp of his personality on Oriya literature, particularly in the fields of criticism and research.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Kumar Tripathy, 'Odia bhasa o sahityaku Gopinathana dana', Samaja, 21 August 1969; Mayadhar Mansinha, History of Oriya Literature (New Delhi, 1962); Srinibas Mishra, 'Samalochana Gopinath Nanda', Jhankar, 21/11; Sudarshan Acharya, 'Pandita Gopinath Nandanak rachanabali', Samaja, 21 August 1969.

P.P.

SARMA, LAKSHMIDHAR (Assamese; b.1898, d.1935) was chiefly a writer of short stories, but he tried his hand at writing poetry and drama also. His Vyarthatar dan (Gift of disappointment, 1934), a collection of five short stories, 'Vyarthatar dan', 'Vidrohini', 'Usha', 'Chiraj' and 'Nina', received high appreciation from ordinary readers as well as discerning critics. These stories reflect, by and large, a bold criticism of modern civilization and oppressive social practices. In the story 'Vidrohini', the author inspires a girl widow to defy the cruel and rigid conventions of society. 'Chiraj' dwells at length on love outside wedlock. Laksmidhar's other stories like 'Vidhabar lara' (The widow's son), 'Munna' and 'Gauri' bring out the author's love for the injured and the insulted.

Laskshmidhar has written a good many plays based on themes drawn from history, mythology and contemporary life. His historical drama Sati Jaymati Kunwari (1936) has for its theme the self-sacrifice and heroic deeds of princess Jaymati drawn from Assam's history. Ghatotkach and Ekalabya are based on the legendary valour of Ghatotkach and the sincere dedication of Ekalavya. Nirmala, Deshar katha, Prajapatir bhul, Atma sanman, and Srinkhal deal with social themes. Of all these plays, Nirmala, perhaps, is the author's best creation. It deals with the life of a teen-aged widow and her silent sufferings in a cruel and repressive social order. Nirmala, a minor girl was given in marriage to an old Brahmin groom who died soon after the marriage. The young widow had to suffer terribly. Her parents arranged for her studies at home under the direction of a tutor with whom she fell in love. Their love affair, however, was taken unkindly by society and the lovers were driven to commit suicide.

The number of Lakshmidhar's poems is small. His poem 'Nari' (Woman) brings out the different phases in a woman's personality—the human, the devilish, and the divine. In some othe poems Lakshmidhar dwells on the glory of his mother-land and the beauty of nature. He was a forceful writer in prose also. His Jivan smriti (Reminiscences) exhibits a forceful prose style, lucidity of diction and gift of narration.

C.K.

SARMA, PHANI (Assamese; b. 1910, d.1970), actor and dramatist of merit, was born in Tezpur. He devoted himself to the art of acting throughout his life and was connected with the Assamese stage and film. At a time when social outlook for the growth of theatre was not very encouraging, Phani Sharma sacrificed his personal interests and worked wholeheartedly for its development not only by acting in various roles on all the stages in Assam but also by writing plays. Of the plays written by him only Bhogjara (1957), Kiya (1961), Siraj (1967), Nagpas (1976), Kalabazar (1976) and a translation of An Inspector Calls (1976) have been published so far. Bhogjara is a historical play based on a conspiracy by Tipamia Gohain, an Ahom prince, against king Lakshinath Singha. Although the structure of the play is not very well-knit, it was been a great success because of its developed dialogues and highly dramatic situations. Siraj depicts Hindu-Muslim unity, and Kiya and other plays deal with the socio-economic problems of the contemporary society. His intimate knowledge of the stage enabled him to create situations which have a good stage effect, and that accounts for his success as a playwright.

S.B.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

SARMA, PURNAKANTA (Assamese) is one of the pioneers of the modern Assamese drama. Biographical details about him, however are not available. He was probably born in Dibrugarh about the seventh decade of the last century and died in the first decade of the current. He received school education at Dibrugarh, but it is not definitely known whether he went for higher education. As a writer he came to limelight in Assam Bandhu (The friend of Assam), a monthly magazine published in 1885-1886, to which he contributed a few articles. He also contributed articles to Jonaki (1889-1903), the most important literary magazine of the last decade of the nineteenth century. This magazine ushered in a new phase in Assamese literature.

Purnakanta Sharma composed the third Assamese kavya, Nala-charita, dealing with the mythological theme of Nala and Damayanti. It was published in 1889, but unlike the two previous modern kavyas, Sita-harana and Abhimanyuvadha, it is not written for a new phase in Assamese literature, but followed the old style of writing in rhymed verse.

Purnakanta also published two mythological plays, viz. Haradhanubhanga (1893) and Harishchandra (1893). According to his own statement in the preface to the former play, he also wrote a social play Madhumalati which for some reason did not come out of the press. Haradhanubhanga is a play of five acts and Harishchandra contains six. Although his plays are written mainly in the western dramatic technique, they are not absolutely free from the influence of the medieval devotional plays known as Anakiyanata. These plays were staged in Dibrugarh and other places with success. There is also a reference in the preface to Harishchandra that the author made certain modifications in a play named Sakuntala with a view to making it stageable for the Dibrugarh stage. It is not mentioned who the author was. It may, therefore, be surmised that Sarma authored this play also, but unfortunately it did not appear in print.

S.S.

SARMA, SATYENDRANATH (Assamese), A distinguished scholar and critic, Satyendranath Sarma's contribution to Assamese literature is varied and colourful. He has edited a number of old Assamese manuscripts with care, precision and scientific insight. He has explored, like many other critics, different aspects of Assamese literature like the novel, drama and kavyas, but it is only he who has made a systematic study of Assamese drama under the title Asamiya natya sahitya. In this book he has dwelt at length on the forms and contents of Assamese dramas, ancient and modern. His study of the Assamese novels is also of considerable importance and is well reflected in the Asamiya upanyasar bhumika and Asamiya upanyasar gatidhara. Sarma's monumental work, however, is Neo-Vaishnavite Movement and the Satra Institution in Assam, where he gives a critical estimate of the Assamese Satras and their impact on the growth of Assamese life, literature and culture. His Sahityar itibritta, Sahityar abhas, Paramparagata prachya natyabhinay, Kahini kavyar pravaha are well-known works. Sarma generally follows the historical method of literary criticism. He is keenly associated with the Assam Sahitya Sabha, Assam Academy and Sahitya Akademi. Until recently he held the Tagore Professorship at Gauhati University.

C.K.

SARMA, TIRTHANATH (Assamese; b. 1911, d. 1986) was born in a Vaishnavite family at Jhanji in Sibsagar district. He was an erudite Pandit of Sanskrit and Assamese, a literary critic of high calibre, a talented short story writer, and a versatile scholar interested in several branches of art and culture. He did his M.A. in Sanskrit from the University of Calcutta in 1937, where he joined as a lecturer in Assamese. Later, he joined Assam Educational Service and worked as the Librarian of Cotton College, Guwahati, till 1956. With the cooperation of the people of western Guwahati he started the Pragjotish College in 1957 and became its founder Principal.

While in Calcutta, he contributed a series of critical articles to the monthly Avahana (1929-1964) on various aspects of early Assamese literature. Some of these literary articles were later published as a book, Pancha puspa. They reveal his deep insight, literary acumen and a capacity to write on difficult subjects in a lucid language. His next work, Sahitya-vidyaparikrama which deals with alamkaras (figures of speech), defines, explains and illustrates with appropriate Assamese quotations all the alamkaras mentioned in Sanskrit poetics. He also wrote a dozen of short stories published in different magazines in the thirties and early forties. His crowning literary success is the biography of the eminent historian and litterateur, Benudhar Sarma (1886-1982), regarded as one of the best biographies in Assamese literature. Unlike other biographies, it is not a panegyric but an objective assessment of Benudhar's life and works. He received the Sahitya Akademi Award on this work in 1987. His great work is the translation-cum-interpretative exposition of the nine principal Upanishads. Sarma also published a book of poems and two books on Gandhian literature and philosophy.

S.S.

Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

SARMA: See also under SHARMA

SARMISTHA (Bengali), Michael Madhusadan Datta's first play, was published in 1858 and first staged a year later. It is one of the important plays in the initial phase of the history of Bengali drama. Madhusudhan claimed it to be the 'first attempt in Bengali to produce a classical and regular drama.' The plot was taken from the story of Devayani and Sharmistha in the first book of the Mahabharata. The dialogues are rather stilted, situations predictable and commonplace, and characters sterotyped and underdeveloped. Though it followed the conventional Sanskrit drama very closely in respect of characterisation and unfolding of the story, it was certainly the first significant attempt to adopt certain norms of European plays. Datta himself translated this play into English.

S.D

SAROD (Gujarati; b. 1914, d. 1972), alias Manubhai Trivedi, was born at Rajkot. He wrote ghazals under the pen-name 'Gapil'. He took the Bachelor's degree from Gujarat College, Ahmedabad, and started writing poetry soon after. After doing his LL.B., he practised law and worked as a civil judge in Gujarat and Saurashtra. During service he came into contact with old minstrels ad ascetics of Saurashtra, and was impressed by their songs and bhajans. He himself could sing bhajans in old tunes. He suffered brain haemorrhage while reciting a poem at a poetry session, leading to his death next day.

The spirit of devotion, quest for the ultimate being, yearning for union with God, and joy in experiencing His cosmic presence are the subjects of his poetry. Ramras (1956) and Surata (1979) are his two collections of poems which are quite touching because of their sincerity of feeling and natural rhythmic beauty.

Even in his ghazals the main sentiment is devotion blended with the note of abandon found in the Sufi poets. His posthumous collection of ghazals, Bandagi (1972), contains some of his well-known ghazals which have won him a high place among the devotional poets and ghazal writers in Gujarati.

Ra. S.

SAROJA, HARINANDANA THAKUR (Maithili; b. 1908, d. 1945), novelist, short story writer and essayist, belonged to a Mithila Brahmin family and was well-versed in the scriptures. He had a good command of Sanskrit language and developed a keen interest in the ancient literature of Maithili. He worked as a librarian in the Prabhat Library of Babu Jagadishanandan Singh at Madhubani. He wrote a novel, Madhavi Madhava (1935); two plays, Bandhu-vigraha and Vidyapati-vijaya; a critical work Vidyapati (1940); and numerous short stories and essays published in different journals like Mithila-mihir, Mithila-mitra, Bharati, etc. His novel Madhavi Madhava, though immature from the point of view of technique and plot construction, is full of idealism and the spirit of social reform. Unlike his novel, his short stories produce a tragic effect on the readers. His early stories were written on the pattern of folk-tales, with a didactic ending. The portrayal of charcters in his works is rather unrealistic and the incidents decribed are improbable. Later, he changed his mode of writing and took his plots and characters from real life. All his works were directed against social evils prevailing in society at that time. So his later stories 'Karnaphula' (The ear-ring), 'Vimata' (The stepmother), 'Kaviji ra plat' (The plot of a poet) evoke feelings of tenderness and pity in readers. 'Demanajika ghodi' (The mare of the landlord's clerk, 1936) appears to be his most realistic story, exposing the atrocities of landlords. In his ciritcal study of Vidyapati, he deals with the life, works and literary achievements of the great Marathi poet. Maithili me nataka (1935) is his other literary work of significance.

R.J.

SARSHAR, PANDIT RATANNATH (Urdu; b.1845, d.1903), an eminent novelist, was born at Lucknow. He had had rather sketchy schooling in the Canning College, Lucknow, which he left without taking a degree.

Sarshar's literary career started in Lucknow at a time when the fame of Rajab Ali Saroor as a prose writer was at its zenith. Sarshar broke away from the 'Saroor' tradition, and introduced a new kind of prose along with other writers in Lucknow, who were associated with the Avadh Punch. In 1873, Sarshar joined the Avadh Akhbar as its editor. His first book Fasana-e-Azad, based on his humorous sketches, was serialised in Avadh Akhbar, and subsequently brought out in book form in 1880. His novel Kamini was published by the Jubilee Printing Works in 1894. Later, every issue of the fortnightly, Khum kada-e-Sarshar, floated by the Jubilee Printing Works, contained a 100-page novel by Sarshar.

In 1895, Sarshar migrated to Hyderabad where he was engaged by Maharaja Sir Kishen Prasad to correct and improve upon his prose writings and poetic compositions. Sarshar also edited a journal Dabdaba-e-Asifi. He died in Hyderabad due to heavy drinking.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The works to Sarshar's credit are Jam-e-Sarshar (1887), Sair-e-kohsar (1890), Kadam dhum (1894), Bichhri hui dulhan (1894), Pi kahan (1894), Hushshu (1894), Toofan-e betamizi (1894); Translations: Shams uzzuha (1878), translation of an English book on meteorology, Alf Leila (1901), translation of Arabian Nights; Khudai faujdar (1903), translation of Don Quixote.

BIBLIOGRPHY: S. Latif Hussain Adib, Sarshar ki novelnigari (1901).

G.J.

SARVAJNA (Kannada; 17th c.) was a saint poet for whom poetry was not a full vocation; yet he wrote some 2000 verses in the folk-metre 'tripadi' to express himself on diverse subjects. Some of these verses are philosophical, others a liberal comment on social life.

We know very little of the life of this saint-poet. Scholars place him in the 17th century. Since a manuscript containing his verses is dated 1643 by the scribe, his date may tentatively be estimated to be 1600. Personal details such as his parentage and religion are a matter of conjecture Since the name Sarvajna is used as a 'mudrika' or signature in every verse in most of the manuscripts so far discovered, though in the manuscripts cited above we find Paramartha instead of Sarvajna, the latter alone has come to stay in popular usage. A palm-leaf containing some fifty Sarvajna verses mentions the name of his father as Sanskara Bhatta. This seems to be a scribal interpolation to claim him as a brahmin by birth. The general opinion held by scholars is that he is a Virashaiva.

Sarvajna was one of the outstanding poets of the period, if poet he may called, for he is not a poet in the conventional sense of the word. He appears to have taken to the life of a wandering minstrel. The two thousand verses in 'tripadi' metre that bear his signature do not narrate any story; nor do they propagate any particular creed or philosophy as such. His philosophy is basically humanistic. He laughs at superstitions, human foibles, hypocrisy and bigotry. At times, he is highly reflective and introspective, but is humane and tolerant. On the whole, he has his own robust philosophy of life. His verses are, no doubt, didactic all through; but in essence the expression is poetic. He dealt with a variety of themes like God, fate, religion, morals, social virtues, etc. He can be compared to Vemana of Telugu literature and Tiruvalluvar of Tamil literature.

M.V.S.

SARVASENA (Prakrit). Bhoja in his Shringaraprakasha and Hemachandra in his Kavyanushasana speak of three Prakrit 'mahakavyas'—Ravanavijaya, Harivijaya and Setubandha. Of these the first two are irretrievably lost. Very little is known about Ravanavijaya, but Harivijaya, however, has been greatly appreciated by Sanskrit writers on poetics like Anandavardhana, Bhoja, Kuntaka and Hemachandra. Anandavardhana speaks of Sarvasena along with Kalidasa for effecting suitable changes in the original story in keeping with the sentiment. Bhoja and, following him, Hemachandra mention it again and again to illustrate the characteristics of a mahakavya. As Raghavan remarks, Kuntaka mentions Sarvasena along with Kalidasa as "a poet of the graceful, genius-dominated 'sukumara' style of composition." Dandin mentions Harivijaya in a mutilated verse at the beginning of his Avantisundari, and refers to Sarvasena as a king, probably identical with Sarvasena, the founder of the younger branch of the Vakatakas. If so, Harivijaya was composed in the first half of the fourth century AD. We have no information whether Sarvasena had written any other literary work. It is a pity that his Harivijaya, so highly spoken of by eminent writers on Sanskrit poetics, should have been lost for ever. Fortunately. however, some verses have been preserved for the posterity in certain works on poetics, especially by Bhoja.

V.M.K.

109217

STOCK VERIFY 2020 G.R.V. Library

पुस्तकालय पुस्तकालय गुरुकुल कांगड़ी विश्वविद्यालय

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

END OF VOLUME FOUR

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

COMPILED

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri